ALANA numbers decline for fall

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

After months of speculation, the University of Massachusetts has announced that minority students will comprise approximately 16-17 percent of the Class of 2003.

While this figure is higher than University Chancellor David K. Scott's original estimation of 13-15 percent, it is considerably lower than the 19 percent of Asian, Latino/a, African and Native American (ALANA) students in the class of 2002.

The decline is the result of the University's February decision to deprioritize race as a factor in admissions. Scott claimed that the decision was based on a recent court decision, which barred the Boston Latin High School from using racial quotas in its admissions process. While the University did not use quotas, Scott claimed that the "changing legal climate" regarding the use of race as an admissions factor made a change in UMass-Amherst's admissions procedures necessary.

The change at UMass was met with instant hostility by many students, who responded by holding numerous protests throughout the spring semester. At one rally, students held at a sit-in at the Whitmore Administration Building, while at another they held screws above their heads and chanted, "Don't screw with our future!"

The Student Government Association, the Graduate Employee Organization and the Massachusetts Society of Professors all passed resolutions urging the University to reconsider its position. The University refused, but promised to take measures to try to boost minority enrollment, including an "outreach program", in which faculty, staff and students would contact accepted ALANA students and urge them to attend UMass.

This "outreach program" is cited by Vice Chancellor for Communications Kay Scanlan as the reason for the higher-than-expected minority enrollment. "(The volunteers) did such a good job that the numbers were higher than the original predictions," she said.

It is possible that the figure could drop once the school year begins, as there are always students that have agreed to attend who ultimately do not. Scanlan states, though, that the University has been regularly monitoring the arrival of student's tuition checks, and the percentage of ALANA students has been consistent.

Chancellor Scott has vowed that the University will work to boost the minority enrollment "within the confines of the law," and has stated the he hopes to bring minority enrollment to its previous levels of 19-21 percent. He appointed an Admissions Task Force, which will be giving a report of their findings, and has stated that a task force will be used to determine next year's admissions plans.

Nelson Acosta, director of ALANA Affairs, was unavailable for comment.

The use of race in admissions at public universities became a heated topic nationally when voters in California approved Proposition 209, which barred the University of California from using any form of racial preferences. Ward Connerly, the author of the proposition, then fought to put a similar measure on the ballot in Washington state, where it was also approved. Connerly spoke at a heated forum at Amherst College last year, where he was greeted by boos and hisses from Five College students. Connerly now has brought his battle to Florida, where voters will consider a similar proposition in November

Meal plan to encompass the Hatch, others

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The phrase "dining hall food" may take on a different meaning now that the University of Massachusetts Food Services has extended its services for juniors, seniors, graduate and off-campus students to include the Bluewall, Hatch and Coffee Shop.

Food Services Director Ken Toong said the move to integrate the dining halls with the Campus Center retail food services came after he felt that the two were divided and "not catering to the needs of the students." "I think the students will be a lot more satisfied with the variety we are providing this year," Toong said. "We enhanced the program to include three meal plans for off-campus students. They can eat either in the Campus Center or dining halls."

The "Your Campus Meal Plan" consists of Economy (154 meals a semester), Commuter Express (79 meals a semester) and the Light Plan (35 meals a semester). Students under these options can purchase food at the Campus Center retails for a cash equivalency of $5.50.

As before, the same meal plan choices of the past are still available for students. According to Toong, the only difference is that with the "Your Campus Meal Plan" option, students can now grab a bite in the Campus Center with a slide of a U-Card.

In addition to meal plan choices, dining hall hours have also been extended. Berkshire and Worcester Dining Hall will now be open Monday through Friday until 9 p.m. Toong said the decision came after students complained that the dining halls weren't open long enough and were inconvenient for students with late-night classes.

In addition, Food Services has decided to adhere to the "grab and go" concept. A Coffee Cart will be installed on the Campus Center Concourse and will provide coffee, pastries and bagels. A new feature in Franklin and Hampshire Dining Halls are "grab and go" lunches, pre-packaged sandwiches and grinders for students in a hurry.

It is still up to students to decide whether they are pleased with dining hall food, but some students recognize the changes in meal plans and dining hall hours as a start.

"I think it's good because they're finally listening to the student's feedback and needs," said Cara Grubert, junior Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration major.

Inspectors close frat houses

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

For the first time in years, two fraternity houses have been forced to close due to violations of building, fire and health codes.

Both Pi Kappa Alpha and Delta Chi houses failed building inspections and declined to make the necessary repairs, which led the town of Amherst to revoke their Certificates of Occupancy.

According to building inspector Richard A. Gormely, neither building has been condemned.

The Pi Kappa Alpha house at 498 North Pleasant Street, the first of the houses to be closed, was found by Gormely to have "a lot of problems" when he inspected the building on May 25. Among the violations reported were broken windows, a damaged alarm system and toilets clogged with human excrement.

"Fire extinguishers had been sprayed, there was [rancid] milk spilled, which created a horrible stench, and there was human feces all over the place," said Gormely. "There was all sorts of damage."

The fraternity was given 30 days to make repairs, but, said Gormely, "When we returned, it was even worse than the first time."

"The majority of (the members) had moved out, so we thought that a few of them that stayed might actually keep an eye on the place," he said. "But they didn't."

The damage was so severe, he said, that anyone entering the building was required to be escorted by a police officer.

Michael Wiseman, director of Greek Affairs, said the national office of Pi Kappa Alpha has decided to keep the building closed throughout the semester.

"The extent of repairs is so bad that it will not open [in the fall]", he said.

On May 27, the town of Amherst issued a warning to the Delta Chi house on 118 Sunset Ave for a number of building code violations.

Among the violations were a damaged fire alarm and sprinkler system, missing hand railings, dead lights and inoperable exit signs.

The Delta Chi house was given 90 days to make repairs, 60 days longer than the period given to Pi Kappa Alpha. Gormely stated that the house was given more time to make repairs because the violations were less severe, and because no one would be living at the house over the summer.

However, like Pi Kappa Alpha, Gormely found their house to be in an "even worse" condition when he returned, and Delta Chi's Certificate of Occupancy was also revoked.

According to Wiseman, unlike Pi Kappa Alpha, the Delta Chi house could re-open at any time, "depending on how quickly they get the repairs done."

"It could be the day after the semester begins," he said.

These closings mark the first time that a fraternity or sorority house has been closed since the fall of 1993.

"There are certain houses that always cut it close [at inspection time]," said Wiseman. "Once every six or seven years someone doesn't."

"Usually the sororities don't have these problems," he added.

"It's unfortunate," said Gormely. "Sometimes, the houses have such severe problems that no one wants to take responsibility."

Underestimated numbers cause housing problems

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Student enrollment has significantly exceeded the University of Massachusetts expectations, and as a result, Housing Services has placed some students in hotel rooms and dorm lounges until rooms in residence halls become available.

In the past, temporary "swing spaces" have included rooms in the Campus Center Hotel and lounge spaces in residence halls. Although some students are placed in "swing spaces" each year due to underestimated enrollments, the large over-enrollment for the fall semester has put Housing Services in a position where it cannot predict how long students will be housed in the "swing spaces."

Javier Cevallos, interim vice-chancellor for student affairs, said the University admits a certain number of students every year with the consideration that not all the students admitted will actually enroll. However, this year 400 more students enrolled than the University was expecting.

Cevallos said the increase in enrollment is a result of "an increase in the attractiveness of the campus."

"We are becoming more and more attractive to a lot of people," Cevallos said. "We rate very high as a college in comparison of academic level versus cost."

Some students are not pleased with the current living situation.

"I don't think they should be sacrificing living standards for students to make this school look more elite," said Felicia Lundquist, a senior Spanish and sociology major, and a resident assistant in Gorman/Wheeler. "I disagree with the Honors [Commonwealth] College and the housing situation. I don't think it sends a good image of this university at all."

Until the housing situation can be remedied, many students will not have access to public spaces, such as hall lounges. As for the students in temporary spaces, many will have to find ways to adapt to an environment different than that of a regular dorm room. Many of the lounges providing temporary housing have limited electrical sockets and do not have telephones or outlets for computers.

"It's unfortunate we have to put people in temporary spaces," Cevallos said. "We'll try to solve this as quickly as possible."

Graffiti possible link to death

Graffiti found on the Morrill Greenhouse on Aug. 20 may be linked to the death of Adam Prentice, a University of Massachusetts student who died two years ago as a result of injuries sustained after falling through the glass of the greenhouse.

Prentice was a junior computer science and engineering major at the University. The extensive investigation into his death, by both police and Prentice's mother, has not turned up any witnesses or definitive explanations.

"It [the graffiti] was written by someone who knew about Adam," said University of Massachusetts Chief of Police John Luippold. "We would like to speak with that individual."

Luippold would not disclose the contents of the graffiti, as the investigation is still open.

The graffiti has been removed from the greenhouse. Police are asking anyone who may have observed people or motor vehicles in the vicinity of the greenhouse between Aug. 17 and Aug. 19 to contact them at 545-0895 or 577-8477.

Campus bookstores and food offerings reflect privatization threat

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

The threat of privatization is visibly changing the living room of the University of Massachusetts campus.

With a Starbucks kiosk on the Concourse and Nathan's Hot Dogs in the Bluewall, Campus Center Food Services is following what Student Trustee Seth Avakian called the "trend toward branded foods."

According to Avakian, changes in available food choices in the Campus Center were "without a doubt" spurred by privatization conversations.

But while the changes may appear to be products of privatization, Avakian is quick to say the changes do "not in any way [represent] a decision to privatize."

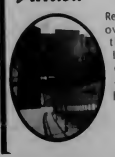
"The University has decided to buy Starbucks beans and cups," Avakian said. "The Starbucks Corporation does not have a footing in this University."

It is up to the University's Board of Trustees to decide if privatization, or allowing private companies to run currently self-operated businesses, is the best option for UMass. Avakian does not expect a decision to be made until January.

The Board of Trustees raised the question of privatization in December 1998. The Trustees requested that Chancellor David K. Scott look into privatization possibilities for Auxiliary Services. Auxiliary Services directs all food service operations on the campus, with the exception of student-run businesses.

University administration hired two consulting firms last semester to examine and report on the operations and financial performance of the University Store, the Textbook Annex and Retail Food Services, which include the Bluewall, Hatch, Coffee Shop, Whitmore Snack Bar, Physical Plant Snack Bar, Hampden Snack Bar, Faculty Club and Graduate Student Lounge.

If the Trustees decided to privatize the campus, the University Store and the Textbook Annex would be affected well before Retail Food Services, according to Paul Page, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance.



Although consultants found the operations and facilities of the bookstores better relative to those of Retail Food Services, Page said the University will move forward with requests for proposals from private companies regarding the bookstores.

For now, the layout of merchandise at both the University Store and the Textbook Annex has been reconfigured, and the Textbook Annex will be open for extended hours.

The brand names in the Bluewall, along with a makeover for the Coffee Shop, are in line with suggestions in the consultants' report.

More changes to Retail Food Services in the Campus Center/Student Union complex may be in the future, regardless of whether or not the Trustees choose to privatize the University.

The UMass Campus Union Task Force on Privatization, in The Alternative Report on Operations and Privatization, has proposed making operating space and equipment renovations to the food establishments already in existence.

Whether upgrading will come in the form of renovations or privatization is yet to be seen.

The University is concerned with making changes that comply with plans for UC 2000, the proposed redesign of the Campus Center/Student Union complex, according to Page.

The University will not be able to make any final decisions regarding privatization until undergoing a state auditor's review of its plans, according to Page.

The Pacheco Bill, a 1994 anti-privatization law passed by the Massachusetts legislature, protects employees of self-operated businesses by requiring private contractors to pay employees at certain wages and offer qualified state employees jobs with the private company.

Communications head resigns, moves to Mt. Holyoke

Patricia R. VandenBerg, assistant vice chancellor for communications and marketing at the University of Massachusetts, resigned in July to become executive director of communications and strategic initiatives at Mount Holyoke College. Royster Hedgepeth, vice chancellor for university advancement, announced VandenBerg's resignation.

During her three years at the University, VandenBerg worked on such initiatives as the development of a "unified image" for the campuses in the University of Massachusetts system, and was a part of the creation and implementation of the new UMass logo.

She also taught in the Isenberg School of Management.

"In many, many ways I regret leaving the university, even as I look forward with great enthusiasm to my appointment at Mount Holyoke," VandenBerg said in a written statement released by the UMass News Office.

News Director Kay Scanlan will hold VandenBerg's former position on an interim basis while a national search is conducted to find a permanent replacement. Barbara Pitoniak, associate news director, has been named interim news director.

The Fine Arts Center has a new central structure where an open walkway had previously been.

UM summer renovations

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

A summer facelift has changed more than just the look of the University of Massachusetts campus. Surface changes, like the colorful glass lobby of the Fine Arts Center, are accompanied by new buildings throughout the rest of the campus.

The Fine Arts Center lobby, a $1.8 million effort, will serve as the main entrance and includes a performance space.

Heading north through the campus, a new animal care building has been completed on Hicks Way and the Morrill Science Center houses a new geosciences laboratory.

The $14.5 million initial phase of the computer science and engineering complex, located in the northeast corner of campus, will house the computer science department this fall, according to John Robinson, manager of capital projects. Robinson said the second phase, scheduled to begin in fall 2000, will house the civil and environmental engineering department and include an auditorium and a distance-learning center.

Summer renovations included general upgrades to some of the residence halls.

"We do a considerable amount of work like this every year" in different buildings, said John Findley, associate director for planning and operations in Housing Services.

Students returning to the dorms will find rooms and common areas repainted and deep-cleaned, according to Findley.

Coolidge Hall has seen roof repairs, and new carpeting, tile, paint and furniture. Roof repairs were also made in Kennedy and Washington Residence Halls; new roofs were installed on Emerson and Leach Residence Halls. Carpeting and tile were replaced in Pierpont Residence Hall. Furniture was replaced in student rooms and lounges throughout Leach Residence Hall, and in parts of Prince.

Construction will continue throughout the semester to install new roofs on Chenoweth Lab, French Hall and the Curry Hicks Cage.

The fence around W.E.B. DuBois Library, decorated by ribbons supporting its destruction, will be replaced by a new fence with a $500,000 price tag. The project is being partially funded by individual contributions from the campus community.

Student found with pot

A University of Massachusetts student was arrested on Aug. 20 and charged with possession of a class D substance, marijuana, according to Amherst police. As of Aug. 27, charges against the student also included intent to distribute.

Bron I. Tamulis, 21, of 51 Pondview Drive is a senior double-majoring in English and Social Thought and Political Economy. Tamulis ran for president of the UMass Student Government Association last spring.

A marijuana-growing operation was discovered in Tamulis' residence after police were led to Pondview Drive following a report of an automobile accident. The driver of a car that had knocked over signs and cut down a utility pole had left the scene of the accident.

A witness provided the car's license plate number, and police followed tire marks on the pavement and a trail of car parts to 51 Pondview Dr., where a damaged car was parked in front of the house. The damage to the car was so extensive that police thought the driver might be seriously injured, and entered the house to search for the driver.

After entering the house and finding Tamulis in stable condition, police discovered more than 80 marijuana plants and equipment used for growing.

Tamulis declined to comment. The investigation is continuing.

Turkey earthquake hits home for UMass profs

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Although the devastating earthquake in Turkey may seem distant, the effects were felt close to home for two University of Massachusetts professors.

Haluk Derin, an electrical and computer engineering professor, was on the phone within minutes after learning about the earthquake that struck 50 miles from his native city of Istanbul.

Derin, who was born in Istanbul, left behind his sister and mother when he came to UMass. When he learned that they might have been caught in the disaster, he grabbed the phone hoping to find some kind of relief.

"The moment I heard about it, I picked up the phone and called them," Derin said. "When I couldn't get through to them I was worried. I thought of the worst immediately."

Filled with anxiety, Derin kept trying until he learned that his mother and sister had been trapped in a car for six hours, avoiding the worst parts of the quake. He said he is grateful for his mother's and sister's safety.

This is not the first time an earthquake has hit Istanbul, and Derin said the damage would have been less had the government been more attentive to creating an earthquake-resistant city. He feels the extent of the damage is a result of the city's unenforced construction codes and unstable building structures.

"People think that there were this many casualties because the buildings were not built according to government standards," Derin said. "I believe it."

With a growing population of over 13 million in Istanbul, Derin said the city attempts to keep up with the increasing demands by "cutting corners" in its construction plans. As a result, many of the buildings in the city are not built to be earthquake-resistant.

When Derin's family learned that there would be aftershocks, they and 10,000 people took refuge in the streets, gardens and parks to avoid collapsing buildings and structures.

"There has to be a realization that this is a concern," Derin said. "Buildings have to be earthquake-resistant and the government will have to live up to the expectation."

Art history professor Walter Denny returned from Istanbul a week before the earthquake. He was concerned about the safety of his friends and has been busily attempting to reach them over the phone.

"Everybody I called so far seems to be okay," Denny said in an Aug. 19 Union News article. "The ones I didn't reach, the phones and faxes are ringing, so I assume their houses are still there."

Denny has made numerous visits to Istanbul to study its history and has written a book on the Turkish art of the Ottoman era. Denny said the conditions of the buildings do not meet government standards and noted that the last great earthquake was in 1902. He said it was always his hope that an earthquake did not strike while he was there.

Letter from the Editors

Express yourself

Hello, UMass students. We hope you had a great summer and are glad to see you. For those new students out there, we would just like to explain a little bit about the Editorial/Opinion page to make you feel more at home.

The Editorial/Opinion page, or Ed/Op page, as it is affectionately called, serves as the voice of the student body for a variety of issues. From personal gripes about the housing office to arguments dealing with privatization, the Ed/Op page is here to serve you. So if you have something to say, come on down!

The Collegian is a newspaper run by students and written for students. Remember that. If you have an issue, don't tell your roommate: he'll stop listening after a while. But the Collegian is read every day by thousands of people and is the best (legal) way to have your voice heard. If you would like to become one of our regular columnists or if you would like to submit a letter to the editor, we're here for you.

Next to the DC menu, the Ed/Op page is the most frequently read print on campus, so if you want to be known, our page is the best way. Our columnists' faces are recognized throughout campus, so if you want to be a part of that, we urge you to come down to the Campus Center basement and give us a try.

Everyone has an opinion about something, so virtually everyone can write for Ed/Op. If you're not funny, but have an interest in politics – or don't watch the news, but have had problems with the financial aid office – we've got a spot for you.

Now, writing for the Collegian probably won't change the world, but who knows... stranger things have happened. In any case, remember that you can call us at 545-1493 should you have any questions. Or, you can come down to the Campus Center basement and speak to someone in person. We hope everyone has a great semester and we hope to hear from you soon.

Alexis Pushkar

I didn't realize that the name should have meant something to me until midnight when my dad called. He told me that there was another mass murder, this one in the state of Georgia.

What I felt was not exactly the proverbial chill down my spine. I felt helpless. Suddenly, the room I was in, 3000 miles away from the United States, filled with phantom murderers – guns pointed at me. My back was against a wall, and yet I still wanted to turn and look behind me.

I felt helpless because I have no way to protect myself from the crazy kook with a gun who may shoot me on some ordinary day when I am licking an ice cream cone or rushing to my car. Chance rules – a few seconds too early or a few seconds too late may mean the difference between eating my Eggo waffle at the kitchen table or getting killed because I skipped breakfast. It's that arbitrary.

A solution might be to buy a gun in order to defend myself. Well, I don't want to. I don't like them. I am not interested in ballistics. I don't have time. Anyway, my aim isn't good enough to play darts, never mind shoot something. I'm more likely to hit the stuffed moose at the other end of the bar than the dartboard.

The question is: why should I overcome my own inertia and laziness and learn to defend myself with a gun when the problem lies not with me but with the fact that guns are falling into the wrong hands? Prevent criminals from obtaining guns and stop violent crime with guns, and the only reason someone like me would need to own a gun is for recreation. Personally, I'd rather do finger aerobics to the tune of Livin' La Vida Loca than use a gun in my precious leisure time. But that's just me.

Unfortunately for the people who use guns for recreational purposes, there are a striking number of heinous crimes in the United States that involve guns. There are those who look at gun homicides and believe that guns should be outlawed completely. There are those who look at those same crimes and label them as unfortunate accidents, faulting not the guns but the people themselves.

The two opposing views are really a matter of optimism and idealism or pessimism, and unfortunately, reality. Do we consider the best in mankind and ignore the bloody, tragic blunders of the few so that the larger group may be satisfied? Or do we cater to the lowest common denominator – the criminal – and take away the rights of the many because of the few? Unfortunately, as the number of mass murders increases, people are having a more difficult time ignoring the reality of the situation: that guns do fall into the wrong hands, the hands of the few.

At the time the Second Amendment was written, America had a different culture. Everyone had a gun. Hunting was common because people needed to kill their own meat. A gun was also useful as people struggled to obtain and defend their own land from Native Americans or other Europeans.

Two hundred years later, Americans buy their meat wrapped in plastic and Styrofoam and purchase their land from someone who has already laid a claim to it. However, one thing has not changed. The Second Amendment is still tremendously powerful. It has down in writing that the citizens of this country have the right to bear arms, implying the possibility that the people have the right to defend themselves from whomever may threaten them, perhaps even from their own government, in order to uphold their own personal liberty.

That amendment places a tremendous amount of responsibility and faith in the people.

When an event happens like the murder in Georgia, it is a blow to my faith in humanity. Given the breadth of both landscape and people in this country, the gun situation seems irreconcilable. My Southern roommates were a reminder of some of the reasons why guns are legal. Some people are raised with them and are used to having them around. They feel more secure in their homes when they have a gun, and guns are used in self-defense if the need arises. Other people who live on or travel across the vast expanses of sparsely habited land in a state, such as Texas, New Mexico or Arizona, might feel more secure with a gun.

I can't understand fully the way that other people live. I have always been fortunate enough to live in a safe neighborhood with the police just a quick phone call away and patrol car around the next bend. I have always been fortunate enough to have ample leisure-time activities so that I do not have to resort to killing things for entertainment. I don't want to infringe on other people's rights, although if I had my druthers, all guns would be banned. Never having held one in my hands, never having had the need to use one, a ban on guns would not interrupt my life in any dramatic way.

Given that others feel the need to own guns, I am willing, for the time being, to put my faith in the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (ATF) and the police. The 1990's have brought a great improvement in the criminal gun situation in this country. While complete safety on the streets is still merely a dream and while the massacre in Atlanta is all too likely to be repeated, the police and the ATF have brought about a drop in the number of licensed gun dealers, which brought about a decline in gun production. Furthermore, the Brady law now stipulates that the identity of every gun buyer be run through the FBI's National Instant Check System or a comparable state system.

In 1997, the nation's homicide rate fell below that of 1968. From 1993 to 1998 violent crimes committed with firearms fell 20% and the total number of handgun homicides fell 25%. With the right tactics and an unrelenting commitment, I believe that the ATF and the police can do a significant amount to prevent guns from falling into the wrong hands.

Perhaps in America we will never have to ban guns. Or perhaps someday here will be a bloodbath so ghastly that the public outcry will overwhelm Congress. The tricky aspect of the gun problem is that changing the policy after a massacre will not bring back the lives of those who have died. It's a terrible way to make public policies. But given all the regions of this country and all the different types of people and views, there seems to be no other choice, since many powerful people are committed to the prevention of a ban on guns. But if it happens, the blood will stain all our hands.

Tough Guy for President

I have a love-hate relationship with Arizona Senator John McCain. The Republican presidential candidate is a staunch conservative and yours truly is a quasi-socialist. Needless to say, I disagree with most of what he believes. However, if I were a rank-and-file member of the GOP, McCain would get my vote for the nomination in 2000. He is among the most honest, courageous and genuine politicians in Washington, and more than ever, that counts for something. One more thing... he's tough as nails.

America needs a tough guy in the White House. Our country and our presidency have been suffering from a serious case of valor-phobia.

Richard Anderson

Consider our string of wimpy chief executives: Jimmy Carter, the soft-spoken, dovish peanut farmer, Ronald Reagan, the Hollywood pretty boy, George Bush, the Ivy League cocktail-party cowboy, and Bill Clinton, who hid in the closet rather than taking a public stance and cried at the Final Four when Arkansas won the national championship.

Now consider John McCain. While most of his fellow Senators have sanctimoniously bemoaned the presence of big money in politics and then refused to curtail their own fundraising, McCain has boldly led the charge on campaign finance reform, vowing to refuse any soft money during his bid for the Oval Office. He also defied his own party leadership by supporting stringent anti-tobacco legislation. During the military action in Kosovo, Senator McCain was one of the few voices calling for the full-scale deployment of ground forces.

Although I abhorred this particular suggestion, I marveled at McCain's brazenness. For a presidential candidate to stake such a wildly unpopular position is quite extraordinary (It is akin to saying you found Schindler's List boring and hopelessly sentimental). Clearly, John McCain is a person who follows the dictates of his beliefs no matter what the cost. And he enjoys it.

This August, McCain appeared on CBS's "Face the Nation" the morning after the Iowa Republican Party held its annual presidential straw poll, a glorified fundraiser that let alone of the nine candidates had the good sense to blow off. When the Senator was asked whether he feared his absence in Iowa would damage his campaign, McCain chortled slightly and said with a smirk that he was glad the Iowa GOP got to throw their little party. He, however, felt a duty to spend his contributors' money responsibly.

He smirked!

When was the last time you saw a presidential candidate smirk? This guy is the Sonny Corleone of politics, a rebel with a cause. He don't take nothin' from nobody! I have visions of President McCain sitting across the conference table from British Prime Minister and mega-wimp, Tony Blair (said to be playing Robin in the upcoming Batman sequel). The room is tense after several hours of negotiations and when Blair's gaze lingers slightly too long on the President, McCain leans forward and says with a steely glare, "You lookin' at something?" (pause) "Tony?" Or picture House Speaker Denny Hastert and GOP Whip Tom DeLay exhaling loudly after exiting an arduous meeting with President McCain.

"Oh man," Hastert says. "Did you see his face when I asked him not to veto the farm aid bill?"

DeLay shudders. "The Look! I hate The Look. I thought for sure he was gonna' drop you!"

"That guy is scary," exclaims Hastert as he wipes his brow.

Of course, even a cursory study of McCain's past elucidates his Clint Eastwood demeanor. As a Navy pilot he was shot down over Vietnam and spent six years as a prisoner of war in the infamous Hanoi Hilton. No one can deny that McCain has experienced the cruelty of life first-hand. In contrast, the most traumatic experience of our current president's life was when the MPAA cut two minutes from the orgy scene in Eyes Wide Shut.

John McCain truly can feel your pain but he won't put up with any whining.

"Oh gee, my oil embargo hurt your sales last year?" He would say to a Texaco executive. "WELL, THE VIET CONG WHIPPED THE SOLES OF MY FEET WITH A BAMBOO ROD! THAT REALLY HURT, YOU MORON!"

McCain talks the tough talk, walks the tough walk, and has the life experience to back it up. I may not agree with the things he says, but what he says is what he means and he will act accordingly.

Our world and our country are going crazy. Every day events unfold which defy logic and tax our ability to reason. From unfathomable crimes to unbelievably stupid television, nothing seems to make sense. America is in dire need of leaders with vision and the courage of their convictions, regardless of political party. We need someone who will cut through all the crap and kick us in the ass.

WELCOME BACK, EVERYONE!

Ahhh... those were the days

It's been three years since I attended my first class here at UMass. It was Exercise Science 210 in a Thompson lecture hall at 9:05 a.m. I have no recollection of what we did in class, but I do remember that I wore jean shorts and brown sandals as the older female students strolled by in short skirts and high-heeled sandals. A sinking feeling entered my stomach that my wide array of mesh shorts and t-shirts didn't fit in anymore.

Without really touring the campus beforehand, I had no choice but to memorize how to get to Thompson so I wouldn't be forced to pull out a map tucked safely in my bag and look like a freshman dork. I don't know what I was afraid of. Eggs thrown at me? Endure a wedgie or have my notebooks (which were safely zippered in my bag) knocked out of my hands? In reality, no one knew who I was nor cared what I did or looked like.

Kathleen Ralls

Remarkably, I must have put on a good show because somebody even asked me where Stockbridge Hall was. Little did he know, he made my first day.

The next few weeks I spent sampling what the DC calls food and dashing back and forth between my two friends' dorms doing nothing but sitting around and forming premature judgments about the kids in our halls. We didn't know what else there was to do.

Well actually, we had been involved with the 30 to 40-person freshmen herd that marches up and down frat row at night, and it hadn't gotten us anywhere. Despite the catcalls from kids driving by, we hung strong because it was all we had at the time.

As far as living situations went, I was mired in one of the all-girls dorms in Southwest: lames. Paired up with two roommates (yes, the tangled triple) whom I had not a thing in common with (and still don't!), I didn't know how I was supposed to make it through the semester. One was a music major, who, after three weeks of heavy-duty studying, spent every day at Rao's Coffee Shop. The other loved the color purple and unicorns and was her high school's Class Flirt.

Me? I had been the class athlete and was thankfully sheltered by my more outgoing friends. Let's just say that no one gossiped about my cutting-edge outfits or wild and crazy stunts I never pulled at the party.

Having decided while in the process of trying out I had no desire to be a collegiate athlete here, I had to figure out what my next step would be. I knew I had to stay busy because I didn't socialize with a cigarette or the bottle.

> "Paired up with two roommates (yes, the tangled triple) whom I had not a thing in common with (and still don't!), I didn't know how I was supposed to make it through the semester."

Luckily, I had my best friend from home and another close friend whom I could lean on. We formed a sturdy tee-pee we leaned so much that year. With 50 kids from my graduating class at UMass that fall, we were told that we would never branch off and find our own thing, whatever that was. But we rationalized that there was no need to toss aside great friendships for the sake of forming new ones. We found out we could do both.

I might have dragged my friends to one too many basketball games (go, whether your glory years are over or not, it's still a lot of fun) or intramural sports. They have also taken me to some events I would never have attended on my own.

We three, after surviving 20 roommates, ex-boyfriends, separation of the domestic and international exchange sort and Haigis Hoopla, are now in a state of shock being seniors (and still proudly wearing mesh shorts!) and assumed to be preparing to earn a job. But we have one more year at UMass to whoop it up and we plan to.

And in case you find or receive a little pink map, keep it. Mine has been sitting in my bag since that first September morning.

All I need to know I learned during my summer vacation

All I need to know I learned during my summer vacation.

-No matter how hot it gets, don't ever give into the urge to wear a "wifebeater". You are not buff enough, no matter what your girlfriend says.

-Wipe down the seat after you pee.

-When the only wild passion in your life is the nonalcoholic fruit drink, you are officially a loser.

It's OK to be a guy and buy one of those glow-wand things during the Fourth of July fireworks and wear it as a necklace, provided that all the following criteria are fulfilled: 1) it is night, 2) you are with attractive girls, and 3) you are drunk.

-There aren't any air conditioners in stock. You shouldn't have waited until the middle of the heat wave to try and buy one, jerk.

-Friends don't ask friends to get high and watch Muppets from Space.

Rob Schultze

-The Red Sox won't win the World Series this year, or next year, or the year after that.

-The caliber of the management at your summer job only becomes apparent when you severely sprain your ankle on the job and your boss offers you a Band-Aid for it, and then you realize that he was totally serious.

-The cute girl flirting with you is underage.

-More people smoke pot during a performance of Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers than during a performance of Black Sabbath. Modern science is baffled.

-Jocks are people too.

-If you tell your mother that you enjoy a certain type of food, you will eat that food for lunch every day for the entire summer. If your mother asks you if you enjoy a certain type of food, you should change the subject, or if that doesn't work, pretend to have a seizure.

-While watching the scene where the tent is being shaken by an unseen power in the innovative horror movie The Blair Witch Project, everyone should reflect on the time when they went camping with the Cub Scouts at Camp Norse in the middle of a monsoon and Jeremy Scarth played the same damn trick on them, causing them to become terrified to the point of hugging their tent-mate, the XXXL Wiffy Cravens. Of course, no reflection of this sort would be complete without dwelling on the next day when they finally caught up with Jerm (as he was known) and beat him until he cried like a girl.

-The beach isn't where you go to get a tan. The beach is the place where you go to show off your tan.

-People who shop at a store with a name that ends in "Mart" are statistically far more likely to be wearing a purple wifebeater and forearm tattoos than those who do not.

-A girl who gets pissed off when you do something chivalrous (holding the door, setting the bone, etc.) is seriously not worth your time.

-Don't put off mowing the lawn. Do it now.

-Somebody who writes good essays for classes but who disgraces the English language on AOL Instant Messenger is not a good writer.

-Nothing is quite as amusing as watching one of your friends go ape on his little brother, especially when the little brother did absoluteh nothing to provoke the attack.

When you were little, kids watched "Mister Rogers" and "Sesame Street". Now kids watch lewd, violent pro wrestling. This is a marked improvement.

-While working your hot, exhausting summer job (where your basic job description is "manually place heavy and awkward bags of dirt and cow poop into the hydraulic trunks of the elderly and stupid") always take time out to remind yourself that, yes, you are miserable and smell like bovine ass, but at least you aren't your friends, who are all doing internships which will somehow get them real jobs and a family and a strong future. Then remind yourself again not to reflect on that because it always depresses you so much.

-Nobody, not a boxer, crack dealer or your father, is as intimidating as a priest.

-Sitting alone on a Saturday night reading a book written by some long-dead foreign guy is a good way to become suicidal.

-Foot brakes rule.

-Drunken people and sober people do not mix. (Note: I had to realize this over the summer because I don't believe I ever encountered a student at UMass who was totally sober.)

-People who pay with exact change are the Devil.

-When strangers ask you what you want to do, and you say "plumber," they congratulate you on your shrewd choice. When you say "write," they give you a look and say, "Good luck" in such a way as to make sure that you understand that you will someday be rooting through their trash looking for Mr. Pib cans.

-The person who spray-painted "Irish Assassins" in green on the back of Papa Gino's is at least half Italian.

-When traveling in a foreign land, take the time to learn the words for "East and "West", because when you have to turn onto a new road, and your only options are "est" and "ouest," and for all you know either of those words could be French for "Land of ROTTING AMERICAN CORPSES", you will become slightly nervous.

-People around the country, for some odd reason, mourned the death of JFK Junior when he died, except for New Englanders above 50, who were still occupied with mourning the death of his father.

-Latin people may have a very vibrant culture, a large population in the United States, a rich history and a language growing in strength and popularity, but their music really blows.

-Nothing beats the thrill of waking up late on a Sunday morning while the rest of your family is at church and thinking "Man, this whole going to hell thing is pretty damned sweet. Uh, I mean, sweet. Yeah, just sweet."

-Humiliation is losing your mini-golf ball in that river that, for some unknown reason, was installed directly next to every hole on the course.

-Speaking in the third person is the lowest form of literary crappiness known to man. If it does, how ever, beat the hell out of writing about Al Gore.

Summer in a ghost town

Note: To all of those who said that all you need for a good time in Amherst in the summer is a fake I.D.: wrong! There's no one around to even drink with. That said, my column shall now begin.

A summer in Amherst is a summer like no other. Very few students reside here. Those of us who do, generally cannot find each other.

During the first session, I knew only two people in Prince/Crampton. It is true that I did meet about five other residents (out of all the Prince/Crampton summer and graduate students and foreign exchange residents, the majority of them being very antisocial). So, to fill the void of the days and nights, I took a class and held a job for a while. The class was actually very good (Sociology 242: Drugs and Society with Lee Blackstone). It is good as both a Gen. Ed. and as a Sociology requirement. The class, as expected is focused on drugs and how society views them. If you go and pay attention, you can learn a lot of useful and interesting stuff (including multiple cures for a hangover). As far as my job went, there were two other students. They were in the other side of the building. I think I've made my point. As my first session class ended, so did my first session job.

> "Even if you have a 9:00-5:00 job and a 6:30-9:00 p.m. class, it will happen. Somehow it finds a way. Trust me."
> Emily Vacanti

The second session was much better, although the classes were equal in excellence. If you are into literature, you may like Comparative Literature 234: Myth, Folktale and Children's Literature. It was a wonderful class. But be aware: take it during the summer. I've been told that the summer session class is the best. In the class we read a lot of good books, including excerpts from The Complete Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm and Alice's Adventures in Wonderland.

At night, I watched my I.Q. slump while I worked behind the counter at Blockbuster Video. It's a fun job, but not at all mentally taxing. In the beginning of August, I decided to get a second job... at parking services! Students beware: if you want a low stress job, Parking Services is not it. That is the reason that you are paid reasonably well: the stress factor.

So at this point, I was spending my mornings at parking services, my afternoons in class, and my nights at Blockbuster. Amherst is that dead in the summer.

My luck did change slightly during the second session. Somehow, I met several more people. A few of them worked with me at Parking Services, a few more at Blockbuster, and then the rest were graduate students in Prince/Crampton. All I can say to all of you (George, Jeff, Jessica, Natty, Emily, Dave, Jim, Jules, Chris, Heather, Jo, etc.) is thank you!

If you plan to stay in Amherst over the summer, there are a lot of factors you need to take into consideration before your decision is final. The biggest factor for me was my social life. During the summer in Amherst, unless you have a selection of friends available at random times throughout the day and night, do not expect any amount of social life. Your schedule will become sporadic. Even if you have a 9:00-5:00 job and a 6:30-9:00 p.m. class, it will happen. Somehow it finds a way. Trust me.

Another factor is what you do with your time spent away from friends. You could get a job, take a class or get in shape – any number of things. But you will always have extra time. I took a class and held two jobs at the end of second session, and I still had time, although I don't know how.

Think about where you might want to live before hand (at least one month). Don't live on campus. The only two dorms that are open over the summer are Prince/Crampton. These are graduate and foreign exchange dorms. They are strictly quiet hour zones. Greenough (a wellness dorm in Central) is during the school year. I'm talking about no fraternities, and Saturday nights, even at mid-night, I'm being serious. And the cost of living there is ridiculous: around $1,100 for the summer session (12 weeks for a double/single). Yes water, utilities, cable, one set of linens included, but many of the fraternity houses were renting out rooms in their houses for $300 for the whole summer. Again, do not live on campus.

In conclusion, if you want to stay in Amherst during the summer, go for it. It is a summer like no other, and you will probably never forget it.

Summer of waiting

Another day and no roommate assignment.

Finally, I came home from work one day to a letter from Housing Services. And this time it was not some false alarm about fitness center memberships! But the anticipation was not over yet! My roommate and I did not have an easy time reaching one another. I called her as soon as I read the letter, but she wasn't home. We played phone tag until that long-awaited Sunday afternoon when I had just gotten home from shopping, one of my most frequent activities. The phone rang and I picked it up, not even thinking that it might be her. "Hello?"

"Hi, is Erica there?"

"Yes. This is Erica."

"Oh hi. This is your roommate."

"Hi! What's up?!"

I was so excited to talk to her at last. I was so relieved that she wasn't a psycho; not only that, but we had some things in common. After our hour-long conversation, I could really picture being friends with her.

During the next couple weeks I thought about little aside from college. I asked my UMass friends questions. I did a highly scientific study about the proportion of freshmen that survived climbing Orchard Hill. And I pondered how many cars we would need to bring all of my stuff to school. How many clothes would I be able to take? How many hours of homework would I be forced to do each night? Would there be room for my TV? Would I even have time to watch it? And if I didn't bring it, would I ever find out if Felicity chose Ben over Noel?

> "As these questions consumed my little freshman brain, I shopped for sheets, towels, and school supplies and I waited."
> Erica Mattison

But aside from all that crap, I wondered if I would have time for everything I wanted to do. Managing a cappella singing, the Skybox, acting, intramural tennis, Hillel, the Collegian, WMUA, Ballroom Dancing and Orchard Hill Area Government would be no easy task. Oh yeah, and then I would need to get in those things called sleeping, eating that great DC food, and going to the occasional lecture.

As these questions consumed my little freshman brain, I shopped for sheets, towels and school supplies and I waited. Summer vacation was coming to an end... but I felt like I was trudging through a dark tunnel waiting to see a glimmer of light at the end. Where was the end? Where was the beginning of my new life? I knew that I would soon leave my part-time office job; I just wanted to get it over with! I would soon be packing up my clothes, squeezing items into the cars. But each day felt like molasses crawling out of a jar. Ironically, waiting to start this school year felt like waiting to finish high school! I couldn't wait to move into my room, start over, meet new people and get involved. Soon, I would be able to prove all those people wrong who insisted that I would become a lush upon entering college.

Words of wisdom

Hello UMass! Welcome back to school. That's right, folks, we have an entire semester's worth of bureaucratic red tape, student protests, alcohol related problems and classes to deal with, so I suggest you put yourself into the correct frame of mind.

For those of us who have already been through it, take it easy, you know what you have to do. But for those frosh that are going to be experiencing their first taste of the college, I've just got a couple of suggestions to help make the next couple of months, if not profitable and worthwhile, then at least enjoyable.

Lesson number one: go to all of your classes (even those "Intro to whatevers" that you are taking just because they fill the Gen. Ed. requirements) within the first week or so. Now, it may sound like silly advice, but you'd be amazed at how many people forget to go and then end up missing tests and such because they never picked up the all-important syllabus. I would love to report that after the first week, classes could be skipped, but in my experience, prolonged skipping of classes has a tendency to lead down a road that runs away from the University which is a way that few people enjoy going, if you catch my meaning.

Lesson number two: when dealing with drunken people, don't let them into your room. This is simply because the intoxicated have a tendency to throw up or otherwise release their bodily fluids in a way that is hard on the carpet. In an amendment to lesson two, if you do have to deal with a drunk person, realize that the most likely time for anyone to vomit is directly after waking up (or directly after hitting ten shots of Insert-name-of-alcohol-here in an hour), so be prepared with some type of receptacle.

Lesson number three: the Collegian exists for three reasons. 1. The crossword is published so that you have something to do during your most boring class, thus one must make sure that you don't work on it at breakfast (like you'll be awake for breakfast) or in any class that is semi-interesting. 2. The cartoons are published so that you have something to read that is both socially relevant and informative. However, make sure that you save these for one of the more boring classes as well. 3. The Collegian publishes all sorts of useful information – like coupons for some of the more popular fast food delivery places and the news – that should be at least looked over before you toss your paper in the circularly marked recycling bins that dot the campus like polka dots dot Dr. Seuss' cow on the weekends.

Lesson number four: go to all of your classes (even those "Intro to whatevers" that you are taking just because they fill the Gen. Ed. requirements) within the first week or so. Now, it may sound like silly advice, but you'd be amazed at how many people forget to go and then end up missing tests and such because they never picked up the all-important syllabus. I would love to report that after the first week, classes could be skipped, but in my experience, prolonged skipping of classes has a tendency to lead down a road that runs away from the University which is a way that few people enjoy going, if you catch my meaning.

Lesson number three: the Collegian exists for three reasons. 1. The crossword is published so that you have something to do during your most boring class, thus one must make sure that you don't work on it at breakfast (like you'll be awake for breakfast) or in any class that is semi-interesting. 2. The cartoons are published so that you have something to read that is both socially relevant and informative. However, make sure that you save these for one of the more boring classes as well. 3. The Collegian publishes all sorts of useful information – like coupons for some of the more popular fast food delivery places and the news – that should be at least looked over before you toss your paper in the circularly marked recycling bins that dot the campus like polka dots dot Dr. Seuss' cow on the weekends.

Lesson number four: go to all of your classes (even those "Intro to whatevers" that you are taking just because they fill the Gen. Ed. requirements) within the first week or so. Now, it may sound like silly advice, but you'd be amazed at how many people forget to go and then end up missing tests and such because they never picked up the all-important syllabus. I would love to report that after the first week, classes could be skipped, but in my experience, prolonged skipping of classes has a tendency to lead down a road that runs away from the University which is a way that few people enjoy going, if you catch my meaning.

Lesson number two: when dealing with drunken people, don't let them into your room. This is simply because the intoxicated have a tendency to throw up or otherwise release their bodily fluids in a way that is hard on the carpet. In an amendment to lesson two, if you do have to deal with a drunk person, realize that the most likely time for anyone to vomit is directly after waking up (or directly after hitting ten shots of Insert-name-of-alcohol-here in an hour), so be prepared with some type of receptacle.

COME ON DOWN TO THE CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT AND WRITE FOR ED/OP!!

Boo goes back to Schoo'

Welcome back, everybody, to the 1999-2000 school year here at the University of Massachusetts! For some of you, this fall semester is a welcome relief to the hours of work compounded with living at home, and dealing with parents. For others, the new experience of going to a huge university is a welcome sight in the face of small schools where everybody and their mother knows the names of all the people you hooked up with. Let's face it, just about everybody is looking forward to going to college. Anyway, as you move into the utopian community that is UMass, you may ask yourself, "What can this institution do for me?"

Well my friends, you are asking the wrong question. A classic line from the Book of Boo states, "Ask not what your university can do for you, but what you can do for your university." If you expect to come here, take the classes, get blasted every weekend, pick up some VD's, and then expect to pick up a high-profile job, you're sadly mistaken. That's what Harvard is for. However, do not despair. For while we here at UMass lack in brute academic strength, we have the awesome power of Campus Activities!!

What is your fancy? Do you want to be a social activist? A culturally-enriched person? A media mogul? A politician? Here at UMass, you get all these and a bag of chips. You can often use these university activities to bolster up your academic experience. In today's fast paced world, getting a degree in anything often means little without supplementary experience. Some people end up changing their majors. Others go out into the world for internships. However, the experience you are looking for is often right under your nose. Sniff it out, for crying out loud!

Boo Downs

You want to make the world a better place? We have organizations for all your activist needs, from the environmentally sound MassPIRG, to the idealistic Cannabis Reform Coalition. There are religious organizations, political organizations, and social organizations, all waiting for your participation. Any cause you fight for is our cause, so viva la revolution!

So, you need a community where people understand who you are, and your heritage can be celebrated? UMass can take care of that. Diversity is paramount in a large campus, and we have what you are looking for. We have plenty of cultural/ethnic organizations, from the Black Student Union to the Pride Alliance. All ethnicities and lifestyles are accepted. Sorry, no ignorance, intolerance, or COD's are accepted.

> "Ask not what your university can do for you but what you can do for your universtiy"

Do you have a hankering for some media power, or do you want to be known on campus as a writer or reporter? UMass has all the media you want, from television (UVA-TV 19), to radio (WMUA), to even newspapers (You are reading one now). It's not even limited to these, as there are plenty of media outlets out there where you can express yourself.

If hobbies and games are your bag, there are clubs and organizations for almost every interest. Whether you want to go postal in the Paintball club, or get intellectually stimulated in the Chess Club, UMass has the resources to make your dream come true.

Feel like being a champion, but don't have what it takes to be on the UMass Football team? Come on down, and sign up for intramural sports, or even try out for the sports clubs. With sports like Volleyball, Rugby Crew, and Sailing, UMass can make you a superstar!

Are you seeking to gain experience in the field of small business? Student businesses can help you gain this valuable experience. With retail and food positions available, you can get money and experience you need for the real world.

Do you want to enhance your academic experience with some organizations that help you to maximize your academic experience at UMass? Academic organizations such as the Natural Resource Economics Association or Pre-Vet Club can help you enhance your educational experience with organizations such as the Poetry Society and the Chemistry Club. Make the best out of your education and experience at UMass.

I've only touched the tip of the iceberg of what UMass is about. There are plenty of opportunities that are available to you. UMass is a school where your total college experience is what you make of it. So, stop reading this and make something out of yourself!

Goodbye goat path

The widely used path from Orchard Hill to the Morrill Science Center has been blocked off and replaced with a concrete path behind the University Health Center.

Morrill spill no real harm

The Morrill Science Center was shut down and evacuated on Aug. 5, due to a radioactive spill during a graduate student's experiment.

A University of Massachusetts official said that no one was hurt in the incident, adding that unless the liquid radioactive isotope was ingested, it did not pose any public health hazard. The official claimed that the building was evacuated to make cleanup easier.

The spill involved less than a teaspoonful of the liquid isotope, but was inadvertently tracked from its origin, room 419, throughout Morrill 2, one of the sections of the science center.

Donald A. Robinson, director of the University's Environmental Health and Safety department, said a number of people who had walked through the waste had to remove their shoes and submit them to his staff to be checked for contamination.

This precaution was taken because the material is colorless and odorless, and merely taking off one's shoes and subsequently eating or wiping the mouth could be hazardous.

The EHS staff found some contaminated areas on the first and second floors, and then closed and locked those areas. The areas were subsequently cleaned with a detergent, and then reopened late that afternoon.

All areas that have been tainted with the material have been cleaned with the detergent and rinsed, and rinse materials have been disposed of as hazardous waste.

Proposed child care center delayed; parents face lack of options

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Thirty-three families are temporarily without day-care options for their children, due to a delay in the opening of the University of Massachusetts' Affordable Flexible Child Care Center.

The center was originally scheduled to open on Sept. 1, giving student parents a low-cost daycare program for their time spent in class. However, the materials needed to build the 3,000-square-foot structure were delivered in August, a month later than the building's manufacturer had originally planned.

Due to this delay in the arrival of the materials, the center will not open until October, or possibly even later.

At press time, the University had not established an alternative plan for accommodating the 33 families that had signed up for use of the center.

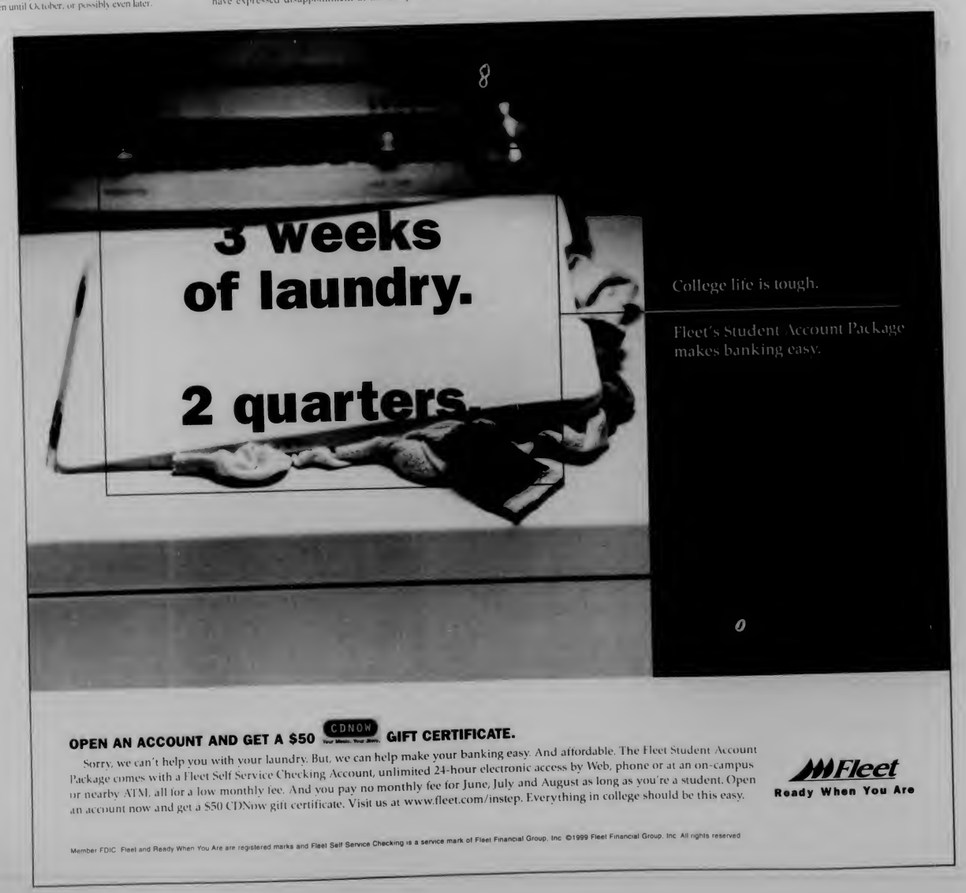
The University was unavailable for comment. However, Maryanne Gallagher, the university child care director, stated in an article in the Aug. 3 Daily Hampshire Gazette that in an article in the Aug. 3 Daily Hampshire Gazette that comparable campus building projects usually take 18-24 months to complete, while the child care center was slated to finish in only nine months.

She also stated that the University had phoned the 33 families in question, and determined which families were in the greatest need of alternative arrangements, should the University be able to provide them.

Members of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) have expressed disappointment at the delay, and at the University's lack of an alternate plan.

"Because they had offered slots for September, even though the delay may be beyond the University's control, it's their responsibility to ensure that every student parent receives child care that was offered it," says James A.W. Shaw, president of GEO.

GEO had proposed the construction of an on-campus child-care center for several years, and the University agreed to create one as part of their contract with GEO last year.



Under the terms of the contract, the Affordable Flexible Child Care Center is to be used by low-income students with children between the ages of two years, nine months and five years. Families using the center will be able to buy three- to four-hour blocks of time throughout weekdays. Fees will be determined on a sliding scale, and lowest income student families will receive greatest priority.

"I'm very disappointed that the University had no contingency plan," Shaw said. "The fact that it was a tight schedule was no secret."

Shaw suggested that the University find a suitable area on campus for a temporary day-care center, such as Skinner Hall, which he called "a viable possibility." Skinner Hall was the home of the University's child-care center last semester, but the School of Education, which previously occupied the building, is now using the space.

He also suggested that the University provide vouchers for student parents at local child-care centers for the duration of the delay.

However, most local centers have already been filled, and most are unable to provide temporary openings.

New rideshare program created to reduce traffic

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

In an attempt to reduce local traffic, the Department of Campus Services has established a Rideshare Program, which provides employees with incentives to form carpools.

The program, which begins this fall, will be made available to students in September 2000.

With the Rideshare Program, all University employees who commit to sharing rides with one or more fellow employees will be subject to a variety of benefits, including preferential "carpool parking only" parking spaces in University lots.

According to newly-appointed Rideshare Coordinator Robert C. Hendry, carpooling will not only help reduce traffic in the Pioneer Valley, but will also improve the environment, and offer an "economic alternative" to the full cost of UMass parking permits.

Hendry's goal is a 25 percent reduction in the number of single-occupancy vehicles entering campus.

"This means we'll have to get 2,000 or so people out of the driving habit," Hendry said.

The reduction in automobiles would be particularly beneficial to drivers in the spring of 2000, when construction is set to begin on Route 9 and the Calvin Coolidge Memorial Bridge. The roadwork is expected to increase the already daunting local traffic significantly.

To encourage employees to share rides, the University will be offering numerous incentives to registered carpoolers. In addition to preferential parking spaces, Rideshare participants will be eligible for 12 no-charge one-day permits per semester, in order to "accommodate the occasional need to drive alone." The University will also offer carpoolers "guaranteed rides home" in emergency situations. Should a registered Rideshare encounter an emergency, such as a medical or family crisis, during daytime business hours, the University will provide that person with a ride to anywhere within a 15-mile radius.

Other benefits of the program, says Hendry, are reduced automotive costs, the conservation of energy, stress reduction and the registration of participants in prize drawings.

According to Sandra Anderson, director of campus services, the Rideshare program will only be open to faculty and staff for the 1999-2000 academic year because of the University's limited time in developing the program.

"It would be way too big an undertaking [for UMass] to provide it for everyone in a month and a half," she said, pointing to the fact that Hendry only began his job as Rideshare Coordinator on June 28.

"The students presented more obstacles than employees because of their varying schedules," said Hendry, noting that many students do not have classes five days a week.

"We want to work out all of the kinks in the program on people who are here for eight-hour shifts first," he said.

As the current system works, any employee who completes a carpool application will be included in a database of carpoolers maintained by the University. Registered employees will receive a "matchlist" with information about other carpoolers in their area, with whom they can form a carpool and receive the program's various benefits.

Anderson stated that the benefits are being provided due to commuters' general reluctance to share rides.

"We took a survey," she said, "and everyone said, 'carpooling is a great idea, but not for me.'"

However, Hendry states that most of the reaction he has received has been positive, noting that his department has already had a number of inquiries. The University is currently promoting the program on the Internet, and through numerous mailings, calls and e-mails regarding Rideshare's benefits.

JUNIORS – SENIORS – GRADS – COMMUTERS – FACULTY – STAFF

Students can use computers

OIT (the Office of Information Technologies)

provides Computing and Internet Services for students, faculty and staff on the UMass campus.
You need an OIT Account if you want to do any of the following:
- to activate the ethernet jack in your residence hall room for highspeed connectivity to the campus-wide network
- to access the Internet and use graphical web browsers from your own computer, via a dialup PPP connection
- to use Windows or MacOS computers in OIT's classrooms/labs, or to use OIT's printers
- to use OIT's host computers (running UNIX), for example, to send and receive e-mail or to use other host-based applications
- to use Netscape Messenger, Outlook Express, Eudora, or any similar mail client to check your OIT e-mail

Students can use any or all of these services for a fee of $20 per semester.

How do I get an account?

- If you have never had an OIT or UMAccess account or
- if you had an OIT account but need to change your password or if you got an OIT account this summer but need to get the OIT CD for fall '99
- bring your UCard to the Campus Center rooms 165—169 during these times:

Tue	Sept 7 - Thu Sept 9	9 am - 8:45 pm
Fri	Sept 10	9 am - 4:45 pm
Sat	Sept 11	CLOSED
Sun	Sept 12	1 pm - 6:45 pm
Mon	Sept 13	9 am - 4:45 pm

Beginning Tuesday, September 14, all the services mentioned above will move to Lederle Graduate Research Center. There will be a sign directing you to the correct room.
- If you used an OIT account Spring or Summer '99, you don't need to stand in line anywhere! Simply log on using the same username and password and start using it. Logging on activates the account and you will be billed $20 by the bursar.

Questions? http://www.oit.umass.edu/hds/acctmgt/

call the OIT Help Desk at 545-9400

And, of course, the OIT Help Desk is open in Lederle lowrise room A109 to answer questions about using your account, using Windows or MacOS computers, using the Web, etc.

UMass alumna returns to space with NASA

A little piece of the University of Massachusetts has gone to space.

UMass alumna Catherine (Cady) Coleman was a mission specialist on July's space shuttle Columbia flight. Her recent five-day mission included deployment of the Chandra X-ray Observatory, an X-ray telescope designed to deliver images of X-ray emissions from celestial objects such as comets, quasars, neutron stars and black holes, according to NASA.

NASA touts Chandra as "the world's most powerful X-ray telescope."

The technology that is allowing scientists to see details of a stellar explosion would also allow a Massachusetts Daily Collegian reader to read this issue from half a mile away.

Coleman was responsible for Chandra's deployment, as well as for conducting a number of scientific and engineering experiments following deployment.

"Cady is a great spokesman for the University, for the polymer science department, for NASA and a wonderful role model for women in science," said Richard Farris, head of the polymer science and engineering department.

Coleman received a Ph.D. in polymer science and engineering from the University in 1991. On her first space mission, in 1995, Coleman carried a UMass banner that is now displayed in the Conte National Center for Polymer Research.

UMass alumna returns to space with NASA

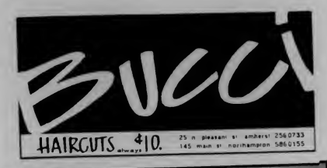
A little piece of the University of Massachusetts has gone to space.

UMass alumna Catherine (Cady) Coleman was a mission specialist on July's space shuttle Columbia flight. Her recent five-day mission included deployment of the Chandra X-ray Observatory, an X-ray telescope designed to deliver images of X-ray emissions from celestial objects such as comets, quasars, neutron stars and black holes, according to NASA.

NASA touts Chandra as "the world's most powerful X-ray telescope."

The technology that is allowing scientists to see details of a stellar explosion would also allow a Massachusetts Daily Collegian reader to read this issue from half a mile away.

Coleman was responsible for Chandra's deployment, as well as for conducting a number of scientific and engineering experiments following deployment.



"Cady is a great spokesmen for the University, for the polymer science department, for NASA and a wonderful role model for women in science," said Richard Farris, head of the polymer science and engineering department.

Coleman received a Ph.D. in polymer science and engineering from the University in 1991. On her first space mission, in 1995, Coleman carried a UMass banner that is now displayed in the Conte National Center for Polymer Research.

UM graduate student designs tiny Web-server

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts computer science graduate student has designed a computer chip that could very well revolutionize technology in the modern household. This particular chip is functionally an aspirin-size computer that acts as a Web-server.

A Web-server is a specially prepared computer, which connects to the Internet and makes information available on the World Wide Web. Previously, only desktops or larger computers have acted as Web-servers, which is precisely why Hariharasubrahmanian Shrikumar's discovery is so unique.

Believed to be the smallest Web-server ever constructed, about the size of a match-head, it can be easily embedded into many household appliances. By doing so, the user could access virtually any electric device in their home through the Internet. A homeowner could turn the heat up before coming home from vacation, turn on their porch lights at night or check on the babysitter with a Web-cam.

The benefits within the home are equally impressive. Essentially, Shrikumar has found a way to communicate universally between appliances, even if they are made by different manufacturers. Because his computer uses the universal Internet language "TCP/IP", one appliance can now effectively trigger another over a continuous home network.

So, in the morning, the alarm clock could tell the thermostat to rise, the TV to turn on for the local news and the coffee maker to start a fresh pot. The computer would even make programming the VCR easier, thanks to a more sophisticated, graphic interface on the Net.

Shrikumar, who has the computer installed in his apartment near the university, believes his discovery is significant because it combines Internet technology with the microchips running the appliances that we use on a daily basis.

Plus, unlike most new technology, it is practical to implement this tiny computer now, thanks to its low cost. Earlier this year, a Stanford research group built a more powerful device with similar applications that cost more than $800. Shrikumar's computer can be built for less than $1, making it affordable to manufacture and install in many home devices.

The computer consists entirely of a small microcontroller chip called PIC, a 4-megahertz processor and a 32-kilobyte memory chip used for storing Web pages and other such data.

While these numbers are paltry compared to modern personal computers, which run much faster and store hundreds of times more information, they are a testament to Shrikumar's extremely concise programming. Most software applications nowadays are multi-megabytes long with millions of lines of code, but Shrikumar was able to fit all the information he needed onto his very small memory chip.

In fact, the Web-server is about 400 times smaller physically and 1,000 times smaller in terms of software capacity, than any other Web-server currently available. In the race for smaller, more compact, inexpensive technology, Shrikumar has set the standard pretty high.

Since Shrikumar debuted his small server online July 14, it has served 45,000 web pages to about 6,000 users worldwide from 56 countries. Shrikumar's Web-server can be found at http://www-ecs.cs.umass.edu/~shri/iPic.html.

News analysis on the Middle East: Quake shakes Turkey

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

Turkey

A devastating earthquake on Aug. 17 not only brought physical destruction, but also shook up Turkey's political and social system.

The earthquake left an estimated 18,000 people dead and 200,000 more homeless, according to CNN. Many citizens argued that building standards have been regularly ignored, causing many houses to immediately collapse during the quake.

The Turkish government's alleged lack of foresight and poor response to the crisis prompted political unrest.

In response to the allegations, Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit told CNN that "mistakes had been made."

Turkish leadership, sensitive to Islamic fundamentalists, attempted to halt the work of Islamic groups that were helping in the relief of quake victims.

Iran

A July protest of 10,000 students in Tehran sparked a bloody conflict between supporters of reform and traditional Muslim leaders in one of the Middle East's most conservative countries.

Religious fundamentalism, introduced by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in the 1979 revolution, is now under attack by many students as well as officials in the secular government. Mohamed Khatami, Iran's president since 1997, has been trying to modernize Iran's economy and improve relations with the Western World.

Many of the student protests, however, were in expressions of frustration of the pace of reforms. Demonstrators claim that Iran has been slow to institute change, largely because of the substantial power that religious officials still hold in the country. Such influence, coupled with countless assassinations of liberal scholars and enemies of Khomeini, has established fear of modernization in Iran. But still, some experts say the protest marks the beginning of a civil and political uprise that may one day unseat Iran's last revolution leaders.

Israel

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak's quest for peaceful borders opened the possibility of costly land-for-peace deals for Israel, but Barak is willing to pay the price for peace.

"I think the time is right for achieving a peace of the brave between Israel and all its neighbors," Barak told CNN.

Israel has been seeking peace agreements along two of its borders with the West Bank and Syria.

Since his election in late May, Barak has been negotiating the implementation of the Wye River accord, a peace deal between the Israelis and the Palestinians signed about one year ago.

The accord's first stage was implemented by Benjamin Netanyahu, who then halted its progress last December, due to his claims of Palestinian noncompliance.

Barak is currently negotiating the implementation of the accord's third stage and a possible release of Palestinian political prisoners.

Israel is also looking to make a possible deal with Syria, its king time enemy.

The Syrians demand that the deal will include the return of the Golan Heights, a substantial part of Northern Israel, to Syria.

"We in Syria need one message in which Israel says it is committed to what has been achieved during the Rabin government and commits itself to this pledge... in order to resume the peace process on that basis," Foreign Minister Farouq al-Shara told CNN.

The above news brief has been compiled from Internet editions of CNN and Time Magazine, www.cnn.com and www.time.com.

Online market for textbooks expands purchasing options

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Pretty soon, there won't be anything college students can talk about with their parents – computers have eliminated the registration lines of old, and may soon make lines at campus bookstores like the Textbook Annex shorter.

With a number of companies running online textbook stores, technology is continuing to change the way University of Massachusetts students can go around the usual red tape each semester brings.

The Textbook Annex hopped on the online business bandwagon in January with the estore (http://estore.aux.umass.edu), an online version of the Annex. Students set up an account with the estore, and have access to all of the books the Annex stocks. Scott Cashman, Textbook Manager at the Annex, said that between 400 and 500 orders were taken last semester.

Cashman said it is difficult to know if business will increase this semester, but the estore is a "quickly growing business starting from a small base."

The recent rise in Internet commerce creates competition for even the online version of the Textbook Annex. Companies like Best Book Buys (http://www.bestbookbuys.com) are devoted to finding the best price for books.

Best Book Buys acts as a clearinghouse for 25 online bookstores, including VarsityBooks.com and Amazon.com. Students can comparison shop for the books they need – Best Book Buys will list which stores carry the books and at what price, including sales tax and shipping costs. Students can order books directly from the Best Book Buys website.

While Best Book Buys offers connections to major bookstores, start-up companies like BigWords.com (http://www.bigword.com) and ecampus.com (http://www.ecampus.com) may have an even greater hold on the market, as they claim to offer the lowest prices. According to a January ABCNews.com article, BigWords can afford to offer students low prices because the company buys directly from book publishers, spending less money itself.

Spending less money at the beginning of each semester pays off, as can selling books back at the end of the semester.

The central website of Follet Higher Education Group, efollet.com, features a Book Buy Back locator that directs students to the nearest partner bookstore where used books can be sold. Grecourt Bookshop, in Northampton, is UMass' closest partner.

The breadth of available online services, as well as their simplicity and efficiency, is appreciated by students.

"It is convenient that you can use your credit card and go online and not have to wait in line," said Elliott McClinton, a senior computer science major.

But, as speedy as online ordering is, the wait for books to be delivered is not welcome.

"I would use the online bookstores if the delivery was quick enough so that I got my books by the time that I needed them," said Heather Carrier, a senior psychology major.

Students using the estore can pick up their books at either the University Store in the Campus Center; Hampden, Franklin or Worcester C-Stores in the dining halls; or the MiniStore in the Student Union, the second business day after an order is placed. Off-campus delivery by UPS is also available; books are delivered two to three days after an order is received. UPS Delivery from other online stores can take up to a week.

The lure of technology may exceed delivery logistics, offering students the choice between getting online or in line, and making textbook shopping a matter of preference.

"If it gives some people the opportunity to stay out of a textbook line, I'm all for it," Cashman said.

Stars Wars fans need hope
Phantom Menace disappoints

Star Wars Episode One: The Phantom Menace
Directed by George Lucas with Liam Neeson, Ewan McGregor, Natalie Portman, Jake Lloyd

First, I have a confession. I saw Star Wars Episode I: The Phantom Menace at midnight on opening day. There I sat for two hours, waiting on a cold sidewalk with a motley collection of middle aged men in Metallica shirts, daylight-fearing pseudo-punks, and bleary-eyed high schoolers, believing in my heart that any movie that could attract such a devoted crowd must be a movie worth seeing.

So the movie began, and two hours later I stood up, disappointment surfacing as the credits rolled. Disappointment? How could a Star Wars movie fail to captivate? In several ways, as it turns out.

But before we jump into that, here's a quick plot recap. The planet Naboo has recently been blockaded by the corrupt Trade Federation, which plans to force Queen Amidala (Natalie Portman) of the Naboo to sign a treaty granting the Trade Federation control of the planet, and protecting them from retribution for their attack.

Two Jedi Knights, Qui-Gon Jinn (Liam Neeson) and a young Obi-Wan Kenobi (Ewan McGregor), are sent to negotiate a peaceful resolution between the Naboo and the Trade Federation, but it quickly becomes clear that the Federation has no intention of backing down. Qui-Gon, Obi-Wan, Queen Amidala and the infuriating alien Jar-Jar Binks narrowly escape from Naboo and set off for the planet Coruscant to seek the Senate's aide in liberating Naboo.

On the way, they become temporarily stranded for repairs on the planet Tatooine, where they encounter a youthful Anakin Skywalker (who will become Darth Vader in time for Episode IV: A New Hope, the first Star Wars movie made). Anakin (Jake Lloyd) wins the spare parts our heroes need in a futuristic formula-one race, and comes along to be trained as a Jedi. Eventually, they return to Naboo with intention of forcefully removing the Trade Federationis invasion army.

It all sounds good, right? So, then, where did it go wrong? To be fair, George Lucas and company had an incredibly high mark to hit with this movie. How do you follow up a trilogy of movies that set such long-lasting standards for science fiction storytelling? Regardless of how well intentioned their efforts, it is impossible to surpass the expectations of so many fascinated, infatuated fans; the reality will always fall short of the dream.

But The Phantom Menace suffered from more than an older sibling syndrome, the most obvious example of which is Lucas's screen writing. I have a strong suspicion that he spends his time watching "Young Hercules" and reading Super Friends comic books, because never has a script sounded so flat, uninspired, and at times downright silly.

So much of the movie's failure to entertain could have been avoided if Lucas had swallowed his pride and hired assistant writers, but as it stands, the audience suffers through two hours of bland, puerile dialogue that does nothing to develop the characters or build excitement. This is especially disappointing, because, unlike the earlier Star Wars movies, The Phantom Menace has an excellent lineup for its key characters. Liam Neeson, Ewan McGregor and Natalie Portman are all extremely talented actors whose potential and experience and are squandered on Lucas's million-monkeys-million-typewriters script.

Leaving the dialogue alone for a moment, the basic story itself lacks the momentum and intrigue of the earlier Star Wars movies. In A New Hope, we watched as a Luke Skywalker, Han Solo and Chewbacca got caught up in a conflict at the highest level of politics, and ended up saving the galaxy from unimaginable tyranny. In The Phantom Menace, however, the major conflict seems small and petty, taking place on just one of a million worlds, with a larger threat nowhere in sight.

I have heard it said many times that The Phantom Menace serves mainly to set the stage for things to come, and that when placed within the larger context of the completed trilogy of new movies, people will better appreciate its subtleties. You know what, though? I don't buy it. Saying that a movie needs its sequels to justify its shortcomings is a lame excuse, to say the least, and it does nothing to help today's audiences.

The Phantom Menace does have one thing going for it, however: special effects. The creatures and ships in this movie are as good as anyone could have hoped for, and the technology of movie effects has progressed to the point where writers' ideas must no longer be held back by technical shortcomings. Models, sets, even actors are being replaced by CGI (computer generated images) equivalents, and with only a few exceptions, the final result is a seamless and beautiful fantasy world.

Even the most sumptuous eye-candy is still only icing on the cake, unfortunately, and Lucas's flat characters and meandering story provide precious little filling. It is truly a shame that more effort wasn't put into The Phantom Menace, for as it stands, science fiction's greatest saga now begins as a disappointing, if pretty, heap of mediocrity.

Kubrick's finale dazzling

Eyes Wide Shut
Directed by Stanley Kubrick with Tom Cruise, Nicole Kidman

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Did anyone really believe that Stanley Kubrick, one of this generation's greatest visionaries and greatest filmmakers, would make an outright porno film? That, now infamous, ninety second trailer with Tom Cruise and Nicole Kidman in front of a mirror probably did more to hurt public perception of Eyes Wide Shut than anything Kubrick did or did not do himself.

People expected, and privately, perhaps even hoped for, some sexual thriller with naked bodies recklessly strewn about the screen. What Kubrick gave them was a brilliant, psychologically laidened glimpse into the paradox of modern day relationships.

The movie is undoubtedly founded in sex. To say that it is about sex, though, is to err. More aptly, the movie deals with sexual desire and how it drives or suffocates a relationship.

Dr. Bill Harford (Cruise) has been (evidently) happily married to wife Alice (Kidman) for seven years; they have a daughter and a lavish life. One day, Alice tells him that she almost gave up everything, her marriage, her daughter, and her future for one night with a naval officer whom she met in passing. Haunted by the images of his wife's pseudo sexual encounter, Bill embarks on his own bizarre, dreamlike sexual journey through the streets of New York.

Despite engendering characters that are, at best, morally ambiguous if not simply flawed, Kubrick, quite remarkably, treats both intimately and ultimately, sympathetically.

It's easy to see Alice as the traditional female temptress "the seductive woman who lures the man to evil" but the emotion runs deeper. Kubrick portrays her as a woman stifled by an imperfect marriage; a woman reduced to a mere housewife; a woman trapped by a man's world where she should not and can not have desires of her own. The recurring dream is her only emotional release, yet she must spurn it because of faithfulness to her husband.

Likewise, Bill is essentially good until his wife's dream jolts him into a new consciousness. His journey, at the movie's core, shocks him at first, but slowly intrigues and consumes him. He recognizes the inherent perverseness around him, yet he never makes a concerted effort to turn from it.

Arguably, this journey is Kubrick's and also Cruise's greatest achievement in the film. Together, they raise Bill's moral quest to chillingly epic proportions. Cruise calls to mind a young Dante venturing into the depths of Hell, seeing it's various tortures for the first time. Kubrick obliges with a New York cityscape draped in a sanguine red and a monotone piano score that strikes spine-tingling chills with each note.

Kubrick, known for his strong visual sense, surpasses expectations with unflinching cinematography. From the first dizzying and inebriated dance sequence, to the explosive revelation of Alice's desire, to the mounting frantic ness of Bill's journey, Kubrick makes every scene explode with an amazing acuteness. Never have Christmas trees been so provocative giving off a pink neon glow that seems to hint at the possibility of strippers or similar adult fare lurking behind every corner.

COURTESY YAHOO.COM

Nicole Kidman eyes Tom Cruise in Stanley Kubrick's Eyes Wide Shut

The one consistent problem with the movie is that some scenes are unnecessarily long or noticeably repetitious, trying to suggest a dream like quality, making them tedious to sit through. While this technique may add a sense of anxiety, disbelief or other-worldliness, see Meet Joe Black, it seems to do none of these for Eyes Wide Shut. In fact, if anything, the film's length further detaches it from most mainstream audiences.

Stanley Kubrick died only five days after screening the film for the first time, and therefore, he never had a chance to comment on it. Critics will most likely debate about what exactly he was trying to say in Eyes Wide Shut for a long time to come.

There is no question that Kubrick believes sexual desire dominates and motivates relationships, if not all of society; he might even point to the Internet for proof. He boldly suggests, perhaps ironically, that polygamy not monogamy is the natural state for people to live in.

Ultimately though, I think Kubrick laments the fact that marriage seems to be our only emotional psychological, and sexual release.

A-

A personal encounter with Blair Witch Project

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

I hate to be self-congratulatory or to straddle the delicate line between reporting and boasting, but I knew about the most surprising story in recent Hollywood memory before it was even news worthy. Like some sort of seasonal flower, I watched The Blair Witch Project suddenly unfold, dazzling people with its new and wondrous beauty.

Sure, I had heard about the small, low-budget Sundance film before summer began and I had even visited the web site. My zeal, however, was not greater than that to see Austin Powers or even Notting Hill. As it turns out, a twist of fate gave me the chance to get really excited.

Thanks to an error in a local Boston paper, on June 20th, a friend and I found ourselves at a special press screening for The Blair Witch Project, and we got in for free to boot. Three weeks later, the movie smashed records as it tallied $1.5 million in box office receipts on only 27 screens, a stunning $56,000 per screen average. The following week it improved to $61,000 on four more screens!

Just big city buzz, right? It will never play to middle America. Wrong again. On a minuscule 1101 screens, Blair Witch made $28.5 million at the box office in its first week of "wide" release û an average of $25,866 per screen. For some perspective, consider Star Wars: The Phantom Menace, quite possibly the most hyped movie ever, averaged only $21,822 per screen when it opened earlier in the summer.

So, what made Blair Witch so special? Well, the movie is undoubtedly testament to the power of a great idea. The premise for those who have been living in a cave: Three Maryland students set out to make a documentary on the local witch legend. They disappear and a year later their footage (the movie) is found.

The Blair Witch Project was a scary movie. I'm not talking about the "slocky bad guy jumps out of nowhere" or the "cat sneaks up behind an unsuspecting victim" kind of horror film, but a genuinely terrifying movie.

The entire movie has a very primal feeling about it. Directors, Eduardo Sanchez and Daniel Myrick, do more with subtlety, darkness and sound than most horror films do with all the gore and violence in the world. They conclusively prove that the unknown, what one can't see, is much scarier than even the most palpable evil.

The Maryland woods, where the film is set, are a dark primitive place; desolate yet mesmerizing. You can't take your eyes off the screen, but can only keep them there through the spaces in between nervous fingers.

Remarkably, the three students' demise is actually two tales interwoven and symbolized by the film's two different cameras. Their black and white sixteen-millimeter camera captures the twisted reality of the woods and its rumored inhabitants, but the color camcorder tells the equally chilling tale of the student's psychological breakdown.

There's a brief scene in the movie when one of the three says that they are in the woods to make a documentary about a witch, not about them getting lost. However, The Blair Witch Project is really about both and how one is as unhinging as the other. It is simultaneously a documentary about both the Blair witch and the students. Throughout the film, the seemingly supernatural events are punctuated by the very real and human reactions of despair and dread.

This bundling of the unearthly with ordinary human fear points to the film's greatest achievement; that is, the blurring of fiction and reality. Thanks in part to brilliant advertising, an Internet blitz, and even well-placed TV "specials", many people went into the movie unsure of whether the events actually happened or not. Indeed, there is a distinct air of authenticity about the whole film.

The documentary style of the film provides the exact eerie atmosphere needed for the scary story to develop. Instead of brief glimpses into the student's world, we are placed aside of them, left to see the same phenomena, to hear the same noises, and to feel the same defeat. We don't mind the prolonged frames of darkness, because that is how the students are experiencing their surroundings.

The three actors, Heather Donahue, Joshua Leonard, and Michael Williams, take on their real names as "character" names. We never get a sense that they are acting. In fact, most of the movie's dialogue was completely improvised. The students were actually left in the woods, made to survive on stale nutrition bars, while the directors played the Blair witch at night.

During one of the only philosophical conversations of the movie, the characters discuss the logistic of filming a documentary: how it's not quite reality behind the camera, because you're still apart from the world around you.

The Blair Witch Project plays out this sense of altered reality to perfection. There is always a feeling that the students don't believe what is happening, even as they see it happen around them. At first, the students are very skeptical about their work; it's just silly. The entire movie builds toward their accepting or suffering through the tangible fear of being lost as well as the intangible power of a mystical witch.

In the climatic ending, the students and the audience meet the Blair witch for the first time. In that sense, both documentaries are completed, as fiction finally meets reality and the fears of both realms are actualized.

For Freshmen eyes only

This is the obligatory, "Welcome to our university. Here's what to do," article that you'll see plastered on just about every college paper across the country around September. The difference between all the others and mine, though, is that I'm not going to try to be cute.

I'm not going to parody Baz Luhrman's "Everybody's Free (To Wear Sunscreen)"; that's so passe. I'm not going to come up with an alphabetical list of great stuff on campus that takes too much time. I'm not even going to do some cheap ripoff of The Blair Witch Project like every other major media organization has in the past month. No. I'm simply going to humbly dispense some of the small, but useful things that I have learned during my first two years here at UMass.

Get to know the people around you. I see it almost every year. About halfway through the semester, someone discovers that the person down the hall is actually in their biology class and neither ever knew it. At very least, get to know everyone in your hallway. You have to see them and live with them everyday, so you might as well be friends with them. Trust me, it will make your dorm a much better place to live and it's the easiest way to meet people without a lot of effort.

Get to know your RA. No, this is not so you can get out of trouble sometime later on in the semester, because that's just not the way it works. An RA's job is tough.

Adam Martignetti

They have to enforce the rules and simultaneously try to be friendly. RA's are a great resource, someone who's older and generally more knowledgeable. Talk to them & you'll probably be surprised by how nice they really are.

Find your way around campus. It's the first day of classes; everyone is jampacked into some huge lecture hall. The professor has handed out the semester's syllabus and has begun explaining everything. Five minutes later, you walk in, because you didn't know where the building was, and two hundred pairs of eyes meet your face like daggers. Then, you can't find a seat. This is about the most unnerving college experience you will ever have. It's easily avoided though, by taking a brief walk around campus. Besides, the first day is probably one of the only times that lecture hall will be full all year.

Find Northampton. Take the Hampshire Mall bus, only stay on until you reach Northampton center. It's truly a blend of commercial and residential areas rarely seen in towns, nowadays. Go to Pleasant St. Theater or The Academy of Music for some independent film fair. Go shopping. Eat; there are tons of great restaurants there. Plus, you'll look cool and hip telling all your friends about your trip there, when they haven't even been to Amonio's yet.

Play Intramurals. We all know that just about all UMass athletics teams are Division 1. We all know that most of us are never going to play big time college hoop or be a part of a National Champion football squad. This doesn't mean that we're restricted to surfing ESPN.com in our dorm rooms. Intramural sports are a great way for everyone to participate in something that they enjoy. There are different skill levels so nobody feels overwhelmed.

Five college culture

Learn, love and live Fine Arts

Kristi Ceccorossi
Collegian Staff

So another season of our unconstrained youth has come to a close and many of us will begrudgingly return to the varied monotonies of college life. But we should hastily settle back into our places here, anticipating the boundless opportunities UMass and the surrounding area will present this year.

There are few communities even comparable to the one in which we live, when it comes to finding something worthwhile, novel, and cheap (if not free) to do. So, forgo the familiar invitation to sit in your friend's dorm room to discuss the proverbial "everything and nothing". Try your hardest to resist the pleasant social atmosphere and potential assault of frat parties. Because, inevitably, those somethings new to wet our palate.

Here's a taste of what's available. Why not edify yourself beyond the required classes by attending a lecture with a title like this one: "Virtualized Reality: Digitizing a 3D Time-Varying Real Event As Is and in Real Time", scheduled for September 15th in the Public Health Auditorium? And if that genre of intellect doesn't excite you, perhaps a more baroque session will. "The Devotional Style of Giovanni Bellini," orated by a real-life curator from the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, Keith Christiansen, (Sept. 21st, Smith's Wright Hall Auditorium) might give birth to an interest you never knew you always had.

There are many distinguished mediums of entertainment besides lecture, including the prolific outpouring of culture from the University's very own, dubiously renovated Fine Arts Center. This season features art shows such as Project #1 Graffiti Wall, a performance on the Library Lawn, sponsored by the Student Visual Arts Group and a gallery opening entitled Altered Space by Grace Williams.

In the tradition of uniquely designed events, the New World Theatre will present Universes; a fusion of poetry, hip-hop and music straight from The Point in the Bronx (September 18th, 8pm, Bowker Auditorium). Maybe you're feeling particularly courageous and should attempt something new to wet our palate.

A platform for this personal discovery could be an audition for one of the many open productions at each of the five college campuses. For example: Mt. Holyoke's casting of Aristophanes' comedy Lysistrata (7:00, Sept. 10th,

Blondie reenergized

By Kevin Monahan

Blondie
BankBoston Pavilion
August 11

BOSTON - Its difficult to resist the temptation to call this band a retro act. With the release of their lackluster 'comeback' album last February, No Exit, one would easily think that Blondie's day has come and gone. It would take a tour to prove to fans that Deborah Harry and company still have the chemistry needed to redeem themselves, despite the absence of two original band members (Frank Infante and Nigel Harrison).

Turns out that they did so with flying colors at the newly expanded BankBoston Pavilion.

Harry, Chris Stein, Jimmy Destri, and Clem Burke took the stage to a standing ovation from the mostly middle-aged, white-collar crowd, at the recently renovated, posh concert tent--a far cry from the punk rock crowd that marked the band's roots at New York's CBGB's.

Opening up with "Dreaming", Harry showed few signs of time taking its toll on her. Still able to bounce around as she did in Blondie's prime, Harry displayed the stage presence required to keep her the sole center of attention.

"Hanging on the Telephone" and "The Rapture", were early favorites. The cuts performed from No Exit were some of the better songs on the album. "Maria," and "Nothing Matters But the Girl" were a few of the high-energy tracks from the new recording. A hardcore punk song brought a smile to the younger crowd, and restored faith that Blondie hasn't forgotten where they came from. But dedicating a song to John F. Kennedy, Jr. (oh! Please) may have been an obligation to the upper class Bostonians that frequent a venue such as the BankBoston Pavilion.

"Atomic" and "Call Me" were also played before the band returned for two encores, which included 'No Exit', thankfully minus Coolio, making the live version much better than the recording. The crowd's vital signs jumped up dramatically for the closing song, 'Heart of Glass', which compelled almost everyone to create a fire hazard and start dancing in the aisles.

All things considered, the number of people at Harborlights that evening that didn't walk out of the show with a smile on their face could be counted on one hand. The new incarnation of Blondie may not be all they used to be, but they can still put on a good show. And that's what they were all about to begin with.

The summer concert scene save Woodstock

How DMB, BNL and Weird Al rocked this summer

COURTESY SAMMY KOON

Always ultra-cool Dave Mathews and his band rocked Foxboro Stadium this May.

Beautiful weather combined with amazing outdoor performances provided for another astonishing summer for music. Woodstock '99 was eagerly anticipated by the thousands with performances by nearly every hot mainstream band called H.O.R.D.E. quits, but many other festivals enthusiastically filled its bill. The Van's Warped Tour touched down in Northampton with its mixture of rap, ska, and hard rock. The Valley Advocate showcased the best music the valley has to offer with the Grand Band Slam. The Roots, Soul Coughing, Strangefolk, and Los Lobos teamed up in Great Barrington to produce Berkfest for the jam-band crowd. While the Falcon Ridge Folk Festival and Guinness Fleadh Festival also provided their share of enjoyment.

Then there were the radio shows; WBCN of Boston and Radio 104 of Hartford had the Red Hot Chilippeppers and Live as main acts while Boston's Kiss 108 celebrated their concert's twentieth anniversary with performances by Elton John, Rod Stewart, Melissa Etheridge, Barenaked Ladies, and Donna Summer.

Although the joys of summer were many, we also had our share of sorrows. The music industry lost a great innovator with the departure of Morphine's Mark Sandman. A truly remarkable individual Mark directed Morphine's distinct style that was able to captivate a worldwide cult following and was well respected by fellow musicians. It was a privilege to see Mark perform on his own street as Morphine headlined Central Square World's Fair for yet another year. It was the final show for Morphine in the states before they departed overseas and Mark's unforgettable tragedy occurred. He was 47.

SUMMER REVIEW

Instead of reviewing artists and shows that were in the press all summer long, the Collegian felt it was necessary to review some memorable performances of both established artists and emerging talent as well.

The Push Stars
Paradise Rock Club
May 22

Everything shined perfectly for Boston trio, the Push Stars, as their release party for their Capitol major label debut, After the Party, was a stunning affair. Solid songwriting and a great melody have broken this act into the national spotlight.

Boston's party band rolled through their energetic set mostly with their new material, while still mixing in songs off their 1996 release Meet Me At The Fair and their 7-song EP Tonight. However, it was the band's new music that put the capacity crowd into an uproar. Like their latest release's lead track 'Am Little Town' which got the crowd dancing while 'Back to the Party' kept the concert going. The show also featured "Drunk is Better than Dead" and off the There's Something About Mary soundtrack 'Everything Shines.'

The Push Stars join Godsmack and Guster as the latest bands to emerge from the storied Boston music scene with major label recording deals. Since forming in 1995 the Push Stars have become regular winners at the Boston Music Awards and in 1997 were named 'Best Unsigned Band in America" by FMI Music Publishing and Radio & Records.

Dave Matthews Band
Foxboro Stadium
May 30

Dave Matthews Band, one of the most popular bands to emerge in recent years, as well as one of the most unique and refreshing, brought their unmistakable acoustic jam sound to Foxboro Stadium for two nights this summer, May 29th and 30th.

I was fortunate enough to snag a ticket for the second date, which was added after the first sold out immediately. Dave Matthews Band enjoys a wide following, equally popular with screaming middle school girls, their wiser, college-aged siblings, and their parents.

The centerpiece of DMB's sound is Dave's completely unique approach to playing acoustic guitar, through his acrobatic fret work, he manages to play bass and melody figures simultaneously, while peppering his music with percussive beats and scratches.

All of this would allow his instrument to stand alone on stage, but DMB uses it as a mere foundation upon which to layer an alto saxophone (played by LeRoi Moore, who also brings out flutes, tenor saxes, and oboes) and a violin (Boyd Tinsley). Carter Beauford on drums and Stefan Lessard on bass fill out the rhythm section, and the final result is a beautifully energetic mixture of sounds, all woven around Dave's solid song writing and sincere, distinct vocals.

This tour is not specifically in support of DMB's newest album, Before These Crowded Streets, and the set list was arranged to reflect this. They opened with 'Warehouse,' followed into an uproar. Like their latest release's lead track 'Am Little Town' which got the crowd dancing while 'Back to the Party' kept the concert going. The show also featured "Drunk is Better than Dead' and off the There's Something About Mary soundtrack 'Everything Shines.'

This tour is not specifically in support of DMB's newest album, Before These Crowded Streets, and the set list was arranged to reflect this. They opened with 'Warehouse,' followed by the fan favorite 'Satellite' both from 1994's Under The Table and Dreaming. Also taken from this album were 'Ants Marching,' the latter of which was saved for the encore. The 1998 album Crash was well-represented, with performances of 'Two Step,' 'Tripping Billies,' and '#41.'

As it to emphasize that the official Before These Crowded Streets tour was over, only two songs from that album were performed: "Don't Drink the Water," for which DMB was joined by jazz banjoist extraordinaire Bela Fleck, and "Stay (Wasting Time)," for which the band recruited the help of three gospel singers. These songs were played back to back in at the end of the first set. Conspicuously absent was 'Crush,' the newest and most successful single off Crowded Streets.

Guest musicians played a large part in the concert's energy. In addition to the above highlights, the entirety of Bela Fleck's band, the Flecktones, all came out for "#41," taking turns demonstrating their talent to the crowd through their virtuosic solos and turning the song into a 14-minute jam session. Santana's bassist even managed to share some stage time with the band.

As is commonly done in such a large venue, immense video walls were placed on either side of the stage allowing those of us sitting far away from the band to watch them play as larger than-life projections instead of tiny figurines. (During 'Don't Drink the Water' these screens played aerial footage of rushing clouds, forests and rivers, and other beautiful scenes highlighting the song's theme of humankind's destructive tendencies.)

Fans who thought they were hearing the crowds an I arrived early were treated to a pair of solid opening bands. Philadelphia-based hip-hop The Roots started the show with a short set of what they call organic hip-hop jazz.

They were followed by Santana, named after the band's mastermind Carlos Santana, whose career spans several decades and gives no indication of slowing down. Santana's unique sound brings African and Latin American influences together and infuses them with a guitar-driven sensibility. An energetic percussion section and Carlos's wailing guitar solos did a wonderful job of exciting the audience's enthusiasm for the show to come.

music lovers as Fountains of Wayne continued to display masterful songwriting while still being able to strike favorable beats.

The band started the show off with "It Must Be Summer" off their most recent release, Utopia Parkway, then switched gears and slid into "Go Hippie."

Fountains of Wayne was joined by keyboardist Chad Murdoch who augmented the bands rich sound. "Radiation Vibe" off their critically claimed self-titled debut rolled into covering songs by Steven Miller and the Cars.

Returning to the stage for an encore the band performed "Travelin' Man" by Rick Nelson and Greg Kihn's "The Breakup Song (They Don't Write 'Em)."

Imperial Teen and Owsley opened to complete a fantastic three band lineup.

Melissa Ferrick
June 11

One of the most amazing and underrated performers of the decade, Melissa Ferrick's strong vocals and powerful acoustic guitar driven songs showcased her astounding talent at a packed Paradise Rock Club in Boston this past June.

Arriving on stage alone, the singer-songwriter performed many songs off her remarkable third studio release, Everything I Need. Ferrick was razor sharp throughout the show despite missing a haircut, as she continuously made light of that fact throughout her stellar performance.

When her support band arrived on stage Ferrick turned it up a notch making for a very potent set. "I Will Arrive" and "Everything I Need" were tastefully done, while she also played "Fear and Time," "Asking For Love," and "Til You're Dead."

Ferrick is unfortunately an excellent example of what is wrong with the major record labels. While still in college, Ferrick was asked to tour with Morrissey for part of his United States tour and his entire U.K. tour. At the completion of the tour she signed with Atlantic. Two releases followed, but failed to yield instant results that a shaken-up label would desire. Instead of staying with Ferrick, supporting her and watching her grow the label and her split their ways. It is a move that Atlantic will be wishing they didn't make.

Watch out because the Train is still picking up speed. Their self-titled major label debut has been out for over a year and a half, but yet each week sales go up and airplay increases. The California based act is being quickly discovered by the general public as they have opened for artists ranging from the Barenaked Ladies, Better Than Ezra, Counting Crows, and Blues Traveler. This past summer they supported both the Dave Matthews Band and Hootie & the Blowfish along with playing on their own. Bill's Bar was the site of one of their stand alone gigs.

The packed music hall quickly got into Train's unique sound. Whether it was "Free," which is powered by Patrick Monahan's vocals and his bandmates'

Rooke Theatre) or one of the few open calls at Amherst College- including Harold Pinter's Betrayal (September 8th).

Finally, your chance to become truly ethnically diverse and not just place a politically hip, but otherwise meaningless bumper sticker on your car: On October 9th, the five college consortium will host its Fourth Annual Tibet Awareness day with a montage of music, food, speakers and trinkets. Following the same theme, Bosnian poets Ferida Durakovic and Christopher Merrill will be visiting Smith College on September 28th to read excerpts from their work and will most likely provide the kind of insight that 'Dateline' conveniently frosts over in their Balkan coverage.

Although there are some who naturally find themselves at these and similarly elucidating events (you know who you are and I envy you), staying cognizant of every bit of active culture is a challenge for most. For those with a refined gravity towards high art, this fall should not disappoint. For the rest of us, rely on frequently updated media (i.e. The Daily Collegian) to stay on top of what's happening. It's far too easy to neglect an exceptional affair in a college town this expansive, without a little guidance.

Plus, they're great exercise and a lot of fun.

Go to the Newman Center. You won't really understand until you've been there, but it's like a refuge for most students. It's a great place to study and their french fries are to die for. It's the only place on campus that you can still buy cigarettes. Plus, it's where Mad Dasher Notes is located, so I'm sure you'll all end up there eventually. Everyone does.

Do Something. Please, for the love of anything, don't sit in your dorm the first week worrying about what classes you're going to take. Add/Drop is two weeks long and there will be plenty of time for that later. Go to the first week activities, even if they are dumb. The off-campus parties are always going to be there with open arms and invitations. I'm not saying that you should go out every night and get trashed but nobody is going to find your room and escort you around college.

Find your niche. UMass is huge. Nobody does everything and don't believe anyone who tells you that they do. I like to write. One day I mustered up enough courage to come down here to the Collegian and start writing. Two years later I'm writing this advice column because I'm Arts and Living editor. The good thing about a campus of this size is that, no matter what your interests are, there will always be an organization and people with these same interests. By getting involved and getting to know these people your college life will be a lot more rewarding. Imagine: I get paid to do this!

screeching guitars, or the steady rhythm of "If You Leave." The band's second single opening cut off their debut, "Meet Virginia," sparked enthusiasm throughout the crowd to sing along.

Vertical Horizon
July 24

Ablaze with energy for their capacity crowd in the city of Boston and fueled by the success of the band's major label debut, Everything You Want, Vertical Horizon put on one of the most spectacular shows of the summer. While the rest of the world's eyes were on Woodstock, over a hundred people gathered impatiently outside the Paradise in hopes of finding a precious scalped ticket. Inside, video cameras, placed in every corner of the club, surveyed the stage.

In a driving set that was serving as the footage for the upcoming video for the song "We Are," Vertical Horizon showcased their live appeal. Combining cuts from previous releases with expected future singles like "Send It Up," "Best I Ever Had (Grey Sky Morning) and their present chart-climbing track, "We Are."

The band's story of establishing an amazing grassroots following began in 1996 when the acoustic duo of Matt Scannell and Keith Kane added a drummer and a bassist. After relentlessly touring the college campuses, the band independently sold a remarkable 70,000 copies of their previous releases.

Now the band seems poised for mainstream success. Years of touring, combined with a remarkable sound, great energy, and major label support will launch Vertical Horizon as a band to watch out for in the year ahead.

Vertical Horizon closed with a cover of U2's "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," ironic for a band that finally seems to have everything coming together and headed in the right direction.

"Weird Al" Yankovic
North Shore Music Theatre
July 25

Weird Al lived up to his name in front of a packed house in Beverly at the North Shore Music Theatre, entertaining the crowd with video parodies, costumes and musical spoofs.

There was a brief intermission after a stand-up comic loosened up the crowd, followed by the anxiously awaited darkening of the theater. Elevated full-color screens, placed at convenient intervals around the circular building, began to play the animated theme to Yankovic's short-lived Saturday morning television show, and the craziness had started.

Weird Al, without the token glasses and moustache that made him recognizable prior to his latest album, Running With Scissors, broke into "Gump", his reworked version of The Presidents of the United States of America's "Lump." Upon completion of this song, Yankovic, with his band on the rotating circular stage in the middle of the building, screamed "Are you ready to polka?"

Yankovic then burst into the latest of his polka medleys, Polka Power! During these medleys, Al takes slices of several mainstream hits and patches them together with an up-beat, polka overtone.

When Al and his band left the stage after only a few songs, the masses were left befuddled, but for only a short time. Keeping the crowd entertained were short videos on the aforementioned screens. Among the moving pictures were clips from music videos, manufactured interviews featuring out-of-context quotes from established artists, like Ozzy Osbourne, and a fake big screen preview, "60% Chance of Showers", poking fun at Hollywood's natural disaster flops, such as Twister and Volcano.

As the lights returned to the stage, the reason for Yankovic's disappearance became hilariously apparent. Al and his cronies had taken on the likenesses of the band Devo, a hit in the early eighties, and had come out to play the title track from 1985's album Dare to Be Stupid. The song, though not a direct parody of any particular Devo tune, was written with the intention of sounding like them.

The costuming didn't stop there. Other stars that were directly imitated by Al included Dire Straits, Trent Reznor from Nine Inch Nails, Michael Jackson, Nirvana and Puff Daddy. During each wardrobe change there were more colorful tidbits on the monitors.

Yankovic couldn't resist getting the audience involved as well, mingling in a seductively tongue-in-cheek manner with several fans in his lounge song, "One More Minute", while making direct eye contact in a number of other songs.

No one in the theater was fooled when he left the stage after a parody medley that contained several unreleased remakes, of such songs as Alanis Morrisette's "Thank U" (about the convenience of fast food), Celine Dion's "My Heart Will Go On" (about a pizza delivery boy), and the Offspring's "Come Out and Play" (about keeping laundry "separated").

The fans roared with approval after only a few minute wait when, for an encore, "Weird Al" returned to the stage cloaked like a Jedi from the movie Star Wars. Even a glowing green light saber appeared among the cheering faithful when Yankovic concluded his concert with the hits "The Saga Begins", a take-off of Don McLean's "American Pie" dealing with Episode I: The Phantom Menace, and "Yoda", a spoof of the eighties hit "Lola".

All in all, Yankovic thrived in the personal setting of the North Shore Music Theater, adding two dimensions to the ridiculousness his fans see everyday on MTV.

Barenaked Ladies
Tweeter Center
July 30

It is remarkable to see how much things have changed in America for Canada's Barenaked Ladies. After years of cult status in the states, the quintet finally broke into the mainstream last summer with the CD release party for Stunt witnessed by an estimated 80,000 in Boston. This summer they embarked on a shed tour, which brought them to the Tweeter Center for two nights, the second of which was on pay-per-view for North America.

In fitting fashion the ladies began the show with "Box Set," a song off Gordon that went nine times platinum in Canada. "Box Set" discusses music industry success and phenomenal record sales, a feat now obtained in the states. Many of the songs performed came from their multi-platinum latest release Stunt.

Kevin Hearn visited Boston for the first time in two summers, as he was diagnosed with leukemia during the recording of Stunt and it took him some time to recover. Kevin's presence on keyboards was felt throughout the band's set.

The energetic set was led by Steven Page and Ed Robertson running across the stage, jumping up and down, and cracking jokes about how they were unrecognized in Boston the day before.

"One Week" got the newly converted fans singing verse-for-verse with Robertson, while "Old Apartment" still remains to excite the crowd. "Never is Enough," "It's All Been Done," and "Alcohol" lead to a great show.

◆◆ George Lucas: Props for rejuvenating Anakin's interest in Star Wars, but the world would be a better place without that Jarn Jar Binks character.

▲ Sketchers: The generation 'Y' sneaker empire went public with a coolly received stock offering. Still, now the 'S' stands for something else: $$$

▼ Heather Graham: Sure she looked great in Austin Powers, but they could have cast a dead fish and it would have been funnier.

▼ Jennifer Lopez: She took a step in the right direction with Out of Sight, but the music career has got to go. Her plan: wear as few clothes as possible; sell lots of albums. Sellout.

◆◆ Mike Myers: Dr. Evil and his pint-sized Mini-Me were sheer strokes of brilliance, but the Austin Powers character really did feel as if his libido had been framed. And Fat Bastard was just dumb.

▼ Dance Pop Music: I guess parents are right when they say things were different when they were young. Ricky Martin. Semi Back-street Boys. Jennifer Lopez. 98 Degrees. Britney Spears. Will Smith. Attractive people, ugh music.

▼ MTV: I know it's not just this summer, but still I never understood what authority MTV handed out movie awards in the first place and this year's fiasco continues to confirm my qualms. Plus, does anyone watch "Real World" still?

▲ Apple Computer Company: Less than two years ago, the company was down and counted out by just about everyone. Thanks to one name and five delicious flavors, though, they're back. IMAC sales have bolstered the company and now the Pirates of Silicon Valley, Steve Jobs and Bill Gates, are teamed together, supporting this incredible rejuvenation.

▲ Will Smith: The man could star in a two hour ad for lawn fertilizer, write a popular rap song about it and people would still pay to see the former or hear the latter -or more likely, do both.

◆◆ American Pie: Undeniably funny and irresistibly raunchy. Apple Pie will never quite taste the same. Still, not as ground-breaking as There's Something About Mary and a bit too silly to support any pretense of sincerity.

▲ Pokemon: I don't know why; there's nothing else to say.

▼ Media Coverage of John F. Kennedy Jr.'s death: Shameless and exploitative. The A&E network aired the man's biography before the body was even found. Princess Diana: Part II. Not to mention that neither person made large enough contributions to society to warrant the media attention and received it primarily because of their "celebrity" status.

◆◆ Woodstock '99: A fairly eclectic and impressive lineup was tainted by constant (bad) media coverage and a disastrous ending. Apparently, the Chili Peppers were a bit too "Red Hot"

▲ The Blair Witch Project: The box office smash, made for less than $35,000, scared audiences right out of their seats and

Wondrous divine providence
Three bands that might save Rock & Roll

Matthew Maggiacomo
Collegian Correspondent

What ever happened to rock and roll?

With the heightened popularity of hardcore and alterna hip-hop hybrids, some people are left wondering exactly where rock music is going to end up in the next few years. Indeed, electronic music is a veritable movement, and it's making its way into the mainstream ever so smoothly. Traditional modern rock outfits like REM and Radiohead have taken a back seat to the newer sounds of bands like Limp Bizkit and Korn, and it's clear that rock and roll will never be the same.

So where do you go if you can't stand the new stuff? About an hour and 45 minutes away, by car, Providence, Rhode Island is contending to become one of the fastest growing local rock scenes in the country, and a few of its heaviest hitters are already catching the attention of the local and national media as well as fans from around southern New England. In recent years, Providence has given birth to bands like Belly, Scarce, and the Agents, and a new generation of bands is ready to continue this tradition.

Here is some information regarding three of the most talented, up-and-coming Providence bands: The Mockingbirds, Eli, and Possibly Chloe.

The band: Todd Belcher (vocals, guitar); Myles Baer (lead guitar); John Windle (bass); Tom Harris (drums).

Their history: Eli has been playing together as a band for three years. After beginning as a punk power-pop trio, they added lead guitarist Baer and developed into a more sophisticated, modern rock band.

Their influences: Though they avoid confirming any specific influences, eli admits that they have managed to evolve into their current sound by feeding off of each other. In short, they are their own biggest influence.

What they sound like: Belcher describes eli's sound as "delicate harshness". The majority of their songs feature sweet melodies courtesy of Belcher's vocals and Baer's infectious guitar riffs, which often evolve into a loud, pulsating, growling chorus. Kind of like Nirvana with ten times more structure, ability and sweetness. Cool, huh?

Albums they've released: it's a band (1996), peculiar trash (1998); eli plans to release a new, 10-song compact disc called nothing shines this fall.

Previous media exposure: MTV local has a review of a recent eli show. Also, the band is featured on the Provrock website: www.angelfire.com/ri/provrock. Find out more: Check out eli's website at www.elitheband.com.

The Mockingbirds

The band: Kenny Cardoso (guitar); Heather Rose (vocals); Kevin Berard (drums); Mike Sullivan (bass).

Their history: The Mockingbirds formed three years ago after the boys left a local band called Mary Innocence and acquired Rose as their singer. Since then, they have formed a tight four-piece outfit with a great set of... songs.

Their influences: The Rolling Stones, Tanya Donnelly, Bob Dylan, Blondie, Phish, the Beatles and Jimi Hendrix. Rock and roll, baby.

What they sound like: Take the Rolling Stones, give them brains and add all the vigor and energy of a one-woman feminist revolution, and you've got the Mockingbirds.

Albums they've released: Work Yourself to the Middle Class, a 5-song CD coming out this month.

Previous media exposure: In addition to being featured by the Providence Journal Band Spotlight, MTV Local Live Review, the Rhode Island College Anchor, and the Providence Phoenix, the Mockingbirds also opened for Candlebox at the 99.7 WDGE (Providence) birthday bash held at the Met Cafe and Lupo's in Providence.

Find out more: Visit their website at www.bostonbands.com/the-mockingbirds. (Really, they're from Providence, not Boston. Shh!).

Possibly Chloe

The band: Veronica Mullaly (vocals); Jay Ferguson (guitar, vocals); Joe Parenteau (bass). They are currently auditioning drummers to replace the recently departed Steve Bouvier.

Their history: Four years ago, Parenteau and Ferguson got together and jammed, wrote a few songs, and almost immediately acquired Mullaly and Bouvier. It wasn't long before they were booking shows and developing into the band they are today. Just recently, they decided to replace their drummer and look for a second guitarist.

Their influences: Possibly Chloe's influences are varied, as all are enthusiastic lovers of music. Ferguson cites the Counting Crows, the Who, Eric Clapton and They Might Be Giants, among others, while Parenteau gains inspiration from Dave Matthews, Live and a variety of jazz artists. Mullaly has been quoted as saying she likes anything she can sing along to.

What they sound like: Jay describes Chloe as a "powerful modern pop rock outfit with huge guitars, a dynamic female lead, a funky rhythm section and strong songwriting ability." Right on.

Albums they've released: Might Be a Demo (1997), 7even Years (1999).

Previous media exposure: 7even Years is currently the featured album on the aforementioned Provrock website.

Find out more: Chloe has a web site too! www.possiblychloe.com

So, if you find yourself desiring something more in your CD collection, or if you're tired of the Amherst Phish jam band scene, you know where to go. Just take the Mass Pike towards Boston and get off at the 146 exit, and proceed south until you get to Providence. Or, be lazy and check out the bands' web sites. Either way, these three bands should satisfy all of your rock and roll needs.

Jennifer Lopez took time off from a budding movie career to ruin summer with some bad music.

Strong summer field
Notting Hill and Sixth Sense

The Sixth Sense
Directed by M. Night Shyamalan with Bruce Willis, Haley Joel Osment

The Sixth Sense is a surreal thriller of sorts, a throwback to a "Twilight Zone" style of storytelling that captures an audience's attention with the eerie uncertainty of the world it creates.

It lies somewhere between psychologically intense realism and science fiction, slowly opening the viewer's eyes to a singularly bizarre arrangement, and never breaking the spell of fascination, even when the movie may appear to lack a forward-moving plot.

Bruce Willis gives a surprisingly solid lead performance as Dr. Malcolm Crowe, a clinical psychologist specializing in children, reminding us that he's not restricted to movies like Armageddon and The Fifth Element. Although at times a bit too unemotional and wooden, Willis manages to paint a character tormented by personal demons, demons which grow out of his devotion to his work, and which threaten to consume his marriage.

Crowe becomes involved with Cole, a troubled young boy suffering at the hands of a terrifying curse he refuses to divulge. Crowe is mystified by Cole's problems, but they do remind him of a past patient; one who broke into Crowe's own home a year earlier and assaulted him before taking his own life, accusing Crowe of abandoning him and leaving him in state of horrible psychological anguish. Helping Cole to overcome his troubled state of mind would allow Crowe, in some way, to forgive himself for his obvious failure to cure the earlier patient.

The Sixth Sense quickly changes from a strict psychological detective story to something much more bizarre as Cole confides in Crowe that he can see dead people.

Amazingly, the movie makes this move seamlessly, keeping the audience convinced at all times that everything it presents is plausible. Indeed, as we begin to view the world through Cole's eyes, what we see is all the more terrifying for the movie's earlier tone of strict reality; had the movie begun with fantasy, however horrific, later developments wouldn't have been nearly as shocking.

Much credit must be given to the young Haley Joel Osment, who plays Cole with a maturity and consistency rarely found in a child actor. Overacting in such young actors is a common detriment to the movies they star in, but Osment is subtle to the point of being creepy. That is not to say that he is unnatural however. When appropriate, he acts like any other terrified child might, and his relationship with his single mother (played well by Toni Collette) is truly touching.

The Sixth Sense ends with an excellent twist that's hard to see coming, but which makes perfect sense in retrospect. It avoids the common surprise-ending pitfalls of uselessness and unnecessary complication, shedding a fascinating light on the rest of the movie.

Without this final revelation, The Sixth Sense would be a haunting, solidly made, and thoroughly entertaining movie. With it, it elevates itself to a piece of cinematic poetry, a carefully woven reality of human misery.

A (David Troupes)

Bruce Willis co-stars with Haley Joel Osment in The Sixth Sense, an eerie summer surprise.

Notting Hill
Directed by Roger Michell with Hugh Grant, Julia Roberts

Notting Hill is not just a romantic comedy. It is the romantic comedy. Somewhere in Hollywood, some producer was sitting, thinking, "You know, My Best Friend's Wedding was pretty good, and Nine Months wasn't so bad either. But neither of them was the romantic comedy. Maybe if I take the star of each respective movie and put them together, then finally I'll have the romantic comedy."

And so Julie Roberts met Hugh Grant, a script was crammed with two hours worth of love and laughs, a kooky supporting cast was assembled, and Notting Hill was born.

The movie begins by introducing us to William Thacker (Hugh Grant), the endearing but rutted owner of a travel bookstore who spends his days pining after glamorous movie star Anna Scott (Julia Roberts). As fate would have it, Anna chooses William's store to walk into. William chooses Anna's blouse to spill orange juice on, and the rest of the movie follows a standard romantic comedy formula through to its heart-warming conclusion.

Grant fits the role of the awkwardly charming, clumsy but witty, and completely smitten Englishman perfectly, bringing to the movie both a sincerity of character and a wonderful comedic sensibility. Roberts performs equally well as the movie star who longs for a relationship grounded in normality, undoubtedly drawing from personal experience.

Her character never succumbs to a Hollywood-stereotype, never revels arrogantly in her glamour nor artificially rejects it, and faces the world with a painful sort of forced practicality about the media's scrutinization of her life. The movie even raises the question: For whom is this a dream come true? Is there any reason to believe that Anna, with all her fame and success, is better off than William? The movie's closing scenes provide a subtle and understated, and yet striking, answer.

Notting Hill spends a lot of its time trying to be funny, throwing out one-liners and humorous dialogue with reckless abandon, and most of the time, the jokes work. Several characters, most notably William's truly bizarre roommate Spike, exist almost entirely for their comedic value.

All of this silliness, although certainly entertaining, does detract slightly from the romantic half of the equation, and the transitions between love scenes and scenes obviously written for their gag potential, are often jarring. The sight of Spike flexing his butt in front of a mirror is more than enough to snuff out the serious tone of the scene into which it is thrust.

Also acting against the movie is the level of disbelief the viewer must suspend in order to buy into the romance. The outrageously improbable premise of the movie requires the script to move quickly from the coincidental meeting to the first kiss (taking only about 15 minutes of the characters' lives), at a point where the viewer doesn't feel sufficiently familiarized with either character. Once this hurdle is leapt, however, an undeniable chemistry begins to shine through, and Grant and Roberts are so gosh darn adorable that even the gruffest of viewers has to admit they're fun to watch.

In the end, this movie was not made as a truly realistic testimony of two souls in love; it was made as a fluffy, enjoyable date flick. And as a date flick, Notting Hill successfully delivers two hours of heart-warming laughter, brought together by a pair of lovers just fictional enough to be fun, and just real

John Travolta and Madeline Stowe try to discover who killed The Generalis Daughter.

The General's Daughter
Directed by Simon West with John Travolta, Madeline Stowe, James Woods

The promise of this murder mystery thriller turns out to be only half-realized during the course of the movie. Fortunately, it's the better of the two halves that comes to fruition.

John Travolta plays an off-the-cuff, loose cannon army detective in a classic, Clint Eastwood-like vigilante mode. He's brought in to investigate the apparent rape and murder of psychological ops expert, Captain Elizabeth Campbell (the titular character). The movie draws its strength from the often complicated and deep psychological probings of all those involved.

In fact, the movie does well to keep a light, almost campy tone as a result. Paul Brenner (Travolta) constantly badgers his female partner, Sarah Sunhill (Madeline Stowe), about her personal life. Likewise, Brenner frequently battles wits with Colonel Robert Moore, his chief suspect. These verbal duels to see who can outsmart the other result in the film's best scenes.

The movie's political undertones also add to this complexity of the search for truth. The mystique of the army and "the army way" surrounds the investigation. The detective duo runs into more than a few bumps and bruises from their unwilling military hosts. The retiring general has a vested interest in quelling curiosity before his impending vice-presidential run. The movie even questions the ethics and politics of West Point – the nation's best military academy.

James Woods' brief appearance as Travolta's target is brilliant; however, the movie lacks the substance, and therefore, the suspense, to make the mystery truly work. Despite the nature of the crime and the rumors of the victim's "personal" habits, the number of real suspects is surprisingly minimal. That is, for three-quarters of the movie Woods is the main suspect; the movie never really presents any other options.

As a result, the only real mystery is how the disappointing ending comes about. For a movie, which, as I've said, prided itself on motive and psychological understanding, the eventual killer seems to have no apparent reason for the murder. The explanation offered is elementary and too unbelievable to be satisfying.

So, despite its strong cast and good performances from both Travolta and Woods, the movie suffers from a fundamental imbalance. Where the fast-paced, witty psycho exchanges leave off, the elements of any basic mystery should carry the movie. They just never quite materialize.

Roger Waters
Pepsi Arena
August 10

I'm a huge Pink Floyd fan. I was devastated when I missed the 1994 tour. I'd be dammed to all eternity if I were to miss Roger Waters' "In the Flesh" tour. So, after making it through the haze of cooked schwag at Albany's Pepsi Arena (there are NO more concert venues that are not corporately owned), I caught a glimpse of the mad genius behind the best years that Pink Floyd has seen. Opening up with "In the Flesh?" from Floyd's 1979 classic, The Wall, Waters emerged on a scaffold midway up the stage. Waters and his "bleeding heart band" went on to play the first quarter of The Wall. The rest of the set consisted of 100 percent Pink Floyd material, including "Shine On You Crazy Diamond," which was performed in front of a larger-than-life image of Syd Barrett. "Dogs" and "Wish You Were Here" were pulled off well with Waters' vocals in place of Floyd guitarist David Gilmour's.

After a ten-minute intermission, Waters and his band came back for another entire set. Which was made up of select tracks from Pink Floyd's 1973 masterpiece, The Dark Side of the Moon, and songs from Waters' solo albums such as Radio KAOS, and 1992's Amused to Death. The one song encore, "Comfortably Numb," was handled well, despite the fact that the song suffered a bit due to the absence of Gilmour playing his blistering guitar solo.

There was not a second of the performance that was not mesmerizing. With sets not nearly as overly grandiose as Pink Floyd used on their 1994 tour, the lighting effects and sets were definitely theatrical, and quite beautiful. Although his voice may be a bit burned out, Waters managed to put on a great show, and put to rest any rumors that the deposed bassist and lyricist will be rejoining Pink Floyd anytime in the near future.

Austin Powers:
The Spy Who Shagged Me
Directed by M. Jay Roach with Mike Myers, Heather Graham

Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me is, without a doubt, one of the most anticipated movies of the summer. The first movie enjoys a wide cult following, carving out permanent niches for Mike Myers' colorful and entirely unique characters in American culture. Can anyone honestly say that they've never put their pinkie to the corner of their mouth and smirked at one time or another?

The difficulty for Myers lies in how to follow up such a successful film, and on June 11th, the answer came in a boatload of new genitalia jokes, suspiciously named women, and generously outrageous comedy.

As the movie opens, Austin's lady love from the first movie, Vanessa Kensington (Elizabeth Hurley), is discovered to be a Fembot, one of the lethally seductive robots from the first Austin Powers movie. Austin destroys her immediately, thus restoring himself to full bachelor hood, and he sets off to live life to fullest while defending the free world as a secret agent.

It doesn't take long for Dr. Evil, Austin Powers' nemesis (played to hilarious perfection by Myers) to surface with another diabolical plan. He steals Austin Powers' "mojo", and the periodontally challenged British operative must travel back in time to the swinging sixties to retrieve it and stop Dr. Evil's diabolical designs.

In many ways, The Spy Who Shagged Me is simply a reiteration of the first movie, reusing an old joke for every new one it offers. Much of the humor is shamelessly lowbrow and childish, but Myers' comic genius makes even the filthiest of bathroom talk sparkle with hilarity.

The supporting cast hasn't changed much since the first movie, with Seth Green as Scott Evil (Dr. Evil's angsty son and unappreciative heir to the Evil empire), Mindy Sterling as Frau Farbissina, Will Ferrell as Mustafa, and Robert Wagner as Number Two. Rob Lowe joins as Young Number Two (his Robert Wagner impression is excellent). In addition to taking on the roles of Austin Powers and Dr. Evil, Myers plays Fat Bastard, a Scottish assassin as deadly as he is obese.

Heather Graham takes over the role of leading lady as Felicity Shagwell, a CIA operative and fellow super-agent, and does a good job with the roll, although her lack of comedic experience dulls her jokes somewhat. What she lacks in experience, however, she makes up in an alluring sense of swinging retro-style, making Felicity the gal of Austin's, not to mention most male audience members' dreams.

Another newcomer is Mini-Me, a perfect clone of Dr. Evil, at one-eighth his size. Political correctness aside, the humor potential of a miniature Dr. Evil walking around with the original is extraordinary, and not a joke is wasted on the arrangement. Dr. Evil becomes more affectionate toward Mini-Me than to his own son, Scott, and the pair is never far apart (riding around in a ridiculously funny over-sized tricycle with a handle bar basket for Mini-Me).

The Spy Who Shagged Me has all of the slick, cartoonish production of the first movie, and perhaps its only true fault is its hesitancy to deviate from the first movie's successful formula. The original Austin Powers was hilarious because no one had seen anything like it before; Mike Myers had created a new kind of joke, a new kind of comic character and an irresistibly silly style. The Spy Who Shagged Me, although undeniably funny, comes across a little recycled, a little less fresh and infectious than its predecessor.

Big Daddy
Directed by Dennis Dugan
with Adam Sandler Dylan and Cole Sprouse

Big Daddy perhaps best represents the polar opposites that Adam Sandler must face with each of his movies: the desire from many of his fans for him to do more adult roles (The Wedding Singer audience) versus the childish simplicity of his immature humor (The Waterboy audience).

In his latest movie, Sandler plays Sonny Koufax, your basic average slacker, who unwittingly inherits a kid, supposedly fathered by his roommate (Jon Stewart). At first, Sonny tries to give him back, but then realizes that he can use the young boy to win back his girlfriend, who is worried about Sonny's immaturity. When that fails, he must choose between his affection for the boy and the real responsibilities of fatherhood.

Ironically, this choice mirrors that of Sandler for his career. Sure, Big Daddy has genuine emotion and some touching moments. Director Dennis Dugan does a nice job developing the relationship between Julian, the young boy, and Sonny. One might even argue that there is a unifying metaphor about fathers and sons that runs throughout the movie.

However, the humor is absolutely stereotypical of what has become expected from Sandler - peeing on public buildings, making roller-bladers fall violently and general bed-wetting. Some of the humor, including the constant gay references, is not only unnecessary, but also admittedly offensive.

A possible explanation as to why audiences let him get away with this type of humor, in fact, they usually embrace it, is because Sandler is instantly likable. Sandler has a consummate nice-guy image, both on-screen and off. He's so affable that people are willing to overlook a few indiscretions for some laughs.

He doesn't disappoint either. Sandler embraces the role, returning more to the mold of his Wedding Singer days. Not only is he boyish and charming, but he also has a certain vulnerability about him. At first, he's apathetic to his new son; the parent who lets their kid do anything. Even when he bears down though, he's still fun and easy-going. He straddles a thin line, but manages to keep it together.

Lastly, Sandler has a deft eye for realizing actors that the audience will embrace. Twins Dylan and Cole Sprouse share the duty of Julian. If nothing else, they're undeniably cute and endearing. In the best friend role, there's the highly likable underdog, Jon Stewart. Oddly enough, Stewart, the comedian, plays arguably the most complex character and does well with it. Then, there's Joey Lauren Adams, who plays Sandler's love interest with a sweet innocence that would even make Renee Zellweger jealous. Personally, I don't think there is any question about it: The Wedding Singer is Adam Sandler's best movie (overall) by far, but I also consider Billy Madison a modern comic classic. For now, Sandler will do fine straddling the line between silliness and earnestness. I just wonder how he would do in a film that wasn't his vehicle - something like Truman Show 2.

American Pie
Directed By Paul and Chris Weitz with Jason Biggs, Chris Klein, Tara Reid

The T.V. ads rambled on about experiences as American and as warm apple pie, giving off a brief, faint glimmer of hope for some sincerity. Well, I must have missed the part of high school during which the beautiful exchange student comes to your house, and strips to masturbate all while you're broadcasting it over the Net.

American Pie is hilarious and perhaps, even too funny for its own good. Undoubtedly, the sexual delicacies of adolescence or the complete lack thereof make for great comic material; material which the movie uses to create some of the funniest and most outrageous scenes since, well, There's Something About Mary.

That is the obvious comparison, a comparison most made before American Pie was even released. As a result, I think writers/directors, Paul and Chris Weitz concentrated on being more outlandish rather than exploring the characters in these predicaments. Too often, the movie succumbs to stereotypes and plot conventions.

Four male adolescents make a pledge to lose their virginity before prom night (Been there, done that). Of course, they are all ultimately faithful. The neurotic, overly intellectualized bookworm is seduced by an older woman (The Graduate). The insecure, unpopular loser winds up with the girl against all odds (Sixteen Candles). The jock discovers his "sensitive" side and, despite the outcries of his athlete buddies, chooses the girl over sport (Just about every poorly-done sports movie ever made).

However, this is not to say that the Weitz brothers are completely unoriginal. By casting virtual unknowns, the pair separates the movie from the abundant bevy of teen stars out there right now. We aren't watching T.V. stars, i.e. Buffy or Dawson - and it seems more realistic because of their anonymity.

Also, the story line of the longtime couple struggling to reach the final step is well treated and surprisingly insightful. And thanks to a strong performance from Tara Reid (Urban Legends), there is a real sense of some female perspective in the movie, something virtually unheard of in the genre.

The creation of the father figure, though, is real magnificence. He's the father that every boy wishes for - he buys his son Playboy and Hustler, yet he still preserves the acute awkwardness of all those "let's talk about the birds and the bees" moments. Sure, most of the time his humor lies in absurdity, but, upon a closer look, it's not that far from truth.

Somehow, raunchiness and genuineness do not make good bedfellows and, unless I misread American Pie's intentions, there seems to be a constant tension between the two throughout the movie.

In the final scene, the Weitz brothers give us a delicate and tender moment among the friends - a sort of unifying theme that is glaringly absent from the rest of the film.

There is a difference between funny characters in ridiculous situations and human people going through funny experiences. Whether good or bad, American Pie opts for the former over the latter.

Two years ago, this would have been original because of the glaring humor; two decades ago, this would have been original because of its subject matter. Now, it's just funny.

Summer of Sam
Directed by Spike Lee
with John Leguizamo, Mira Sorvino

Call him outrageous. Call him controversial or call him overly political, but never call him boring. Spike Lee is one of the most interesting, and certainly one of the most unique filmmakers in the business.

His movies bring together colorful, yet sincere and immediately familiar characters into an arena of human drama and tragedy; the pettiest conflicts and humblest pursuits are related to the audience with such force and urgency that the gap between screen and viewer is immediately eliminated.

Spike Lee's newest movie uses as its setting New York City during the summer of 1977, when the infamous Son of Sam serial killer walked the streets at night, brutally murdering young couples as they parked.

The movie spends little time with the killer himself, treating him as an almost surreal character, a mere reflection or outgrowth of the insane world in which he hunts.

The heart of Summer of Sam, instead, is the cast of characters whose individual stories intertwine and develop into portraits of misguided devotion, blind faith and blinder fear, and the human capacity for becoming lost in one's own small world to the point of loosing all compassion for others.

As the Son of Sam's killing spree continues, a media-fueled paranoia and panic begins to take hold of an Italian-American Bronx neighborhood, where a gang of hoodlums loosely associated with a local Mafia boss decide it falls on their shoulders to stop the murders.

Vinny (John Leguizamo) finds himself drawn into the witch hunt, partly because he came frightfully close to falling victim himself to the Son of Sam, and now harbors a bizarre obsession with the killer, feeling that he has been granted a second chance at living a better life. Vinny's personal struggles to overcome the compulsion to cheat on his wife Dionna (Mira Sorvino) and escape the life of thuggery he has known all his life are central the movie's theme.

Richie (Adrien Brody), another neighborhood regular, finds himself under suspicion when he returns dressed as a member of the emerging punk rock crowd. His hair gelled out in spikes and sporting a humorously fake British style, he represents everything that threatens to undermine the close-knit Italian community.

This same community, however, is clearly portrayed as devouring itself from within through violent finger pointing and petty criminal activity (the local thug leader and self-appointed defender of the neighborhood, 32-year-old Joey T., is also a drug dealer).

Spike Lee's directorial style keeps the camera moving and the actors large on the screen, and this in-your-face approach allows each scene to develop a wonderful momentum. We move from through the movie with the growing sense that something has to happen to break the tension, that the city is eating itself alive worrying over the Son of Sam.

The dialogue is appropriately profane and holds nothing back in portraying the characters' needlessly volatile lives. Every set, every picture we see of 1977 New York sparkles with the energy of colliding cultures and desperate attempts to ignore the outside world long enough to enjoy oneself for one more night.

Summer of Sam, like many Spike Lee movies, is non-linear in form. Because of the killer's minor role in the movie, plenty of time is taken in allowing the characters to develop themselves in scenes not directly tied to the plot of hunting down the Son of Sam, but the absence of any of these scenes would leave the portrait incomplete. The sum of Spike Lee's script is a full and colorful representation of one summer, one location, and one cast of characters who speak volumes about human nature without becoming morally heavy.

Spike Lee has built his career by telling stories of African Americans, and Summer of Sam is a wonderful testament to his ability to paint powerful and moving portraits of other ethnic groups struggling to preserve themselves within the melting pot of New York City.

(David Troupes)

Runaway Bride
Directed by Gary Marshall with Julia Roberts, Richard Gere, Joan Cusac.

Never had two such jarringly opposite feelings about one movie coexisted inside me, as they did while I watched the trailer for Runaway Bride. After Notting Hill, I thought "Another Julia Roberts romantic comedy? Great, I can't wait." I figured that all the major players from Pretty Woman could spark old magic. Warm, fuzzy sensations flooded my being.

However, I could not overlook one pervading sensation that I got through the whole trailer: the premise of the movie is just so stupid.

Maggie Carpenter (Julia Roberts) is the only newsworthy story in Hale, Maryland; a bride who continually abandons potential spouses at the altar. Ike Graham is an out of work, New York journalist, looking for the story to get him back in. As movie fate would have it, he overhears of this reluctant bride and his story as well as the movie is born.

Despite all the hype about the reunion of Gere and Roberts, the two never manage to attain their much hyped on screen chemistry. Individually, both perform well in character, but the characters themselves never seem to meet on any sort of deeply emotional level. Perhaps succumbing to big expectations, the actors, as well as the writers, try to force some sort of romantic atmosphere, making the relationship seem artificial at best.

Richard Gere makes a triumphant return to the big screen (after disasters like Red Corner) in the admittedly difficult role of Ike. He's funny and sarcastic enough to maintain the antagonistic banter with Roberts, but charming enough to remain endearing to the audience.

Julia Roberts is charming and elegant, as always, but does not do much more than that. And that lack of character depth is arguably Runaway Bride's major problem.

Maggie is self-admittedly "messed up," but no explanation is ever tendered as to why she runs from men before "I do." Likewise, Ike is "meant for" Maggie, but we're never exactly sure why, other than they're both very attractive people who obviously belong together. In perhaps the silliest movie moment ever, the entire situation is attributed to Maggie's inability to choose what kind of eggs she prefers.

Any romantic elements of the movie are glossed over by a bunch of Gary Marshall's picturesque, but annoying montage sequences. The lack of any sort of real romantic interaction is conspicuously absent, leaving a hole between the setup and the obligatory happy ending. Somehow, playing "slap jack" and going on tire swings is now the path to lifelong love.

Runaway Bride opts much more for the comedic aspect of its genre; the movie is undoubtedly funny, thanks in large part to a strong supporting cast. Hector Elizondo and Joan Cusack, the best friends of Ike and Maggie respectively, are both refreshing surprises. Elizondo plays Gere's straight man perfectly, while delivering some hilariously dry lines of his own. And as always, Joan Cusack is quirky enough, or in this case "mysterious" enough, to be funny and engaging.

Runaway Bride was not a bad movie; it was just very disappointing. Overall, it's probably funnier than Notting Hill, but it lacks any sort of sincerity and is nowhere near as romantic. It's pretty much what you would expect, nothing exceptional, but solid if you like that sort of thing.

B (Adam Martignetti)

Bowfinger
Directed by Frank Oz
with Steve Martin, Eddie Murphy, Heather Graham

Bowfinger comes to us from the celebrated comedian Steve Martin, one of the first actors to make a name for himself on "Saturday Night Live", and then move on to carve out a successful career in movies.

This movie, which he both wrote and stars in, displays a typical Martin-esque silliness, taking a team of inept but hopeful characters and letting them stumble their way to success.

In this case, Martin plays Bobby Bowfinger, an unsuccessful movie director who gets his hands on the script he believes will finally bring him and his actors the attention for which they have worked so hard. There's only one problem: for the movie to work, they have to get big screen action super-star Kit Marlow (Eddie Murphy) to take the lead role, and he won't go anywhere near the hopelessly inept team and their laughable story.

To solve the problem, Bowfinger has his actors walk up to the unsuspecting Marlow on the street, read their lines, and attempt to edit out Marlow's confused and frightened reactions. And that's about it.

Steve Martin's script is decently funny, but it spends too much time with the actual details of making the movie (which is called Chubby Rain, and concerns an alien invasion, bodysnatchers style). Fans of older Martin movies such as The Jerk may appreciate his efforts to create sympathy for the same characters he mocks, but the movie seems to waffle between letting us laugh at the hopeless filmmakers, and trying to make us root for them at the same time. Steve Martin himself seems uncomfortable with the movie's style; he's never sure if his shtick needs to be set to funny or serious.

Eddie Murphy helps to bring the laughter count up a bit, playing both the mentally unstable and paranoid Kit Marlow, and his socially deficient brother Jiff. Jiff, in fact, is the best part about the movie: he displays the sort of no holds barred silliness that Martin's script needs to really take off. All of the other characters take themselves too seriously to work in a script already so comically diluted.

Heather Graham joins the team as Daisy, a small-town girl who arrives in Hollywood with dreams of becoming a star. Instead, she finds herself the heroine of Bowfinger's movie, quickly learning the potential of sex as a means of influencing her co-workers. This running joke comprises one half of the reason her character exists; squeezing Graham's figure into tight clothing comprises the other.

Nothing in Bowfinger stands out as incredibly hilarious, or even mildly hilarious. Steve Martin, on his own, is a talented comedian, but he seems weighed down in this movie by the need to tell a relatively complex story and hand out sufficient jokes to each main character (and most of those jokes go completely mishandled).

Eddie Murphy shines on the few occasions he can, but the material for Kit Marlow simply isn't funny, and Jiff doesn't appear until half way through the movie. Heather Graham simply isn't a comedian.

Ultimately, Bowfinger drowns in its own plot, taking too much time telling a story, and not enough time making the story funny.

Mystery Men
Directed by Kinka Usher
with Ben Stiller, Hank Azaria, Janeane Garofalo, William H. Macy

Mystery Men must have sounded great on paper. Somewhere in comic book land, a city's greatest super hero is captured by its most terrible arch villain, leaving a hilarious band of super hero wannabees to defend the frightened populace and restore order to the city.

Actually, I bet the initial pitch for funding went something like, "We'll get Ben Stiller and Janeane Garofalo on screen together, throw in some flatulence jokes, and figure out the rest as it becomes important.

Mystery Men isn't as bad as that scene might indicate, but for a script with a promising premise and a comically potent cast, the laughs are sparse indeed.

As the movie opens, in Champion City, a retirement home is being attacked by an evil gang of red gaggle-sporting thugs. Champion City's beloved hero Captain Amazing (Greg Kinnear) rushes to the scene, and so do super hero hopefuls Mr. Furious (Ben Stiller), The Blue Raja (Hank Azaria), and The Shoveler (William H. Macy).

Captain Amazing succeeds in saving the day, while the trio of junior grade heroes get trounced trying to lend a hand. As to work, they have to get big screen action super-star Kit Marlow (Eddie Murphy) to take the lead role, and he won't go anywhere near the hopelessly inept team and their laughable story.

To solve the problem, Bowfinger has his actors walk up to the unsuspecting Marlow on the street, read their lines, and attempt to edit out Marlow's confused and frightened reactions. And that's about it.

Steve Martin's script is decently funny, but it spends too much time with the actual details of making the movie (which is called Chubby Rain, and concerns an alien invasion, bodysnatchers style). Fans of older Martin movies such as The Jerk may appreciate his efforts to create sympathy for the same characters he mocks, but the movie seems to waffle between letting us laugh at the hopeless filmmakers, and trying to make us root for them at the same time. Steve Martin himself seems uncomfortable with the movie's style; he's never sure if his shtick needs to be set to funny or serious.

Eddie Murphy helps to bring the laughter count up a bit, playing both the mentally unstable and paranoid Kit Marlow, and his socially deficient brother Jiff. Jiff, in fact, is the best part about the movie: he displays the sort of no holds barred silliness that Martin's script needs to really take off. All of the other characters take themselves too seriously to work in a script already so comically diluted.

Heather Graham joins the team as Daisy, a small-town girl who arrives in Hollywood with dreams of becoming a star. Instead, she finds herself the heroine of Bowfinger's movie, quickly learning the potential of sex as a means of influencing her co-workers. This running joke comprises one half of the reason her character exists; squeezing Graham's figure into tight clothing comprises the other.

Nothing in Bowfinger stands out as incredibly hilarious, or even mildly hilarious. Steve Martin, on his own, is a talented comedian, but he seems weighed down in this movie by the need to tell a relatively complex story and hand out sufficient jokes to each main character (and most of those jokes go completely mishandled).

Eddie Murphy shines on the few occasions he can, but the material for Kit Marlow simply isn't funny, and Jiff doesn't appear until half way through the movie. Heather Graham simply isn't a comedian.

Ultimately, Bowfinger drowns in its own plot, taking too much time telling a story, and not enough time making the story funny.

Summer of 1999 box office tally

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

As the public gathers increasing amounts of information from new sources, box office figures are becoming more prevalent as a means to measuring a film's worth. People can now go around reciting the most recent weekends box office receipt totals off the top of their head.

This summer proved no different. In fact if anything, the box office hype was heightened to an all time high thanks mostly to one movie: Star Wars: The Phantom Menace. With Titanic only one year removed, the question on everyone's mind was: can Star Wars break Titanics record and become the highest grossing film of all time?

In this article and throughout the semester, I hope to explain the box office figures, Star Wars didn't even come close to breaking Titanic's record, why The Blair Witch Project was such a big deal and why The Sixth Sense is really under appreciated.

First of all, when it comes to the box office, expectations are everything. No longer is a $100 million dollar film an automatic success. For instance, take Wild Wild West. The movie grossed $111 million dollars, but was considered an absolute flop. Why? Well, the previous two Will Smith movies that debuted July 4th (Independence Day and Men in Black) grossed $305 million and $250 million respectively. So, expectations were really high. Reviews poured in and, needless to say, people simply stopped going.

That's to say, Wild Wild West had very poor legs. one of the three key elements for a successful box office run. Legs are essentially a movie's ability to maintain its box office from week to week; legs consist of word of mouth, the ability to maintain business during the weekday, and the ability to garner repeat business.

For example, Titanic was able to maintain the top box office spot for twenty-one straight weeks, a record, and the main reason it finished with a $600 million domestic gross. Last summer's There's Something About Mary is another example of a film with great legs. It became the only film ever to gain the top box office spot after seven weeks of release and topped off at a remarkable $176 million. Less obvious examples of films with good legs include Anz and Notting Hill.

Other than legs, a successful film depends on its opening weekend and its screen count (the number of theaters nationwide playing a movie at any given time). With these three elements in mind, let's take a look at Star Wars and why it didnit even touch Titanic's record.

From Wednesday, May 19 through Sunday May 23, The Phantom Menace made a record $105 million. The Phantom Menace made a record $105 million, roughly four times more than Titanic made ($28.641 when it opened. And. The Phantom Menace did not have poor legs. In fact, after four weeks it had amassed a whopping $297 million, a multiplier of 3.95 (times its opening weekend). After four weeks, most films average only about a 2.9 multiplier, so Star Wars was far ahead of any inormali movie. However, Titanic's multiplier was an astounding 6.91 for a $198 million gross after one month.

Carry the math out further over time and it's easy to see how Titanic ($600) sank Star Wars ($418l. But, why? Well, Star Wars was front-weighted: it was so hyped that most people, especially fans, went to see it opening weekend. Plus, even if the die-hard fans saw it ten times, it can't compare to the number of screaming teenage girls willing to pas to see Leo take his shirt off, again! Lastly, Star Wars, despite being one of only two movies this summer to hold the number one spot for two consecutive weeks, did have a lot of summer competition to deal with.

The other box office story this summer was the upstart The Blair Witch Project. Made for less than $50,000 dollars, the film grossed $120 million. Whatis remarkable here is that Blair Witch was distributed by Artisan, essentially a non-player in Hollywood. After breaking every per-screen average record, The Blair Witch Project managed to collect $28 million during its opening weekend. It did so on only 1101 screens.

Most 'big' films have at very minimum, 2400 screens. Anything above 2000 is considered a high screen count and the magic number is 3000. 3000 screens is a privilege generally reserved for guaranteed blockbusters. For example, Austin Powers: The Spy who Shagged Me set the all-time record on June 11, opening on 3312 screens. So, the Blair Witch phenomenon was just that much more impressive, topping even Star Wars for best per-screen average during opening weekend.

Lastly, I would be remiss if I did not mention the unexpected and remarkable performance of The Sixth Sense. If not for Blair Witch, this undoubtedly would be the second biggest box office story of the summer. The film has made $107 million after only three weeks of release. It was the only film this summer, other than Star Wars, to maintain the top box office spot for two consecutive weeks; it's currently sitting on its third week. Plus, it became only the third film in the last three years to have three $20+ million weekend in a row. (Titanic, The Phantom Menace)

Most films average a 30-35% drop after their opening weekend, and each weekend thereafter. A drop of 20-25% is considered very good, a film with good legs. Consider, The Sixth Sense dropped only 6% in its second week and a meager 7% the weekend after that. Titanic, the only film ever to make more money its second weekend than its first, alone, can claim a better average than the numbers that The Sixth Sense has posted.

Here: for your benefit is a list of the top ten highest grossing films this summer and their box office totals.

1. Star Wars Episode 1: The Phantom Menace $417,800,897
2. Austin Powers II: The Spy Who Shagged Me $203,100,498
3. Tarzan $165,477,219
4. Big Daddy $158,717,720
5. The Blair Witch Project $120,645,836
6. Notting Hill $114,133,485
7. Runaway Bride $113,513,510
8. The Wild Wild West $111,629,342
9. The Sixth Sense $107,506,281
10. The General's Daughter $101,165,584

Note: At its current rate, The Sixth Sense will likely end up in second place, easily surpassing the $200 million mark. Also, expect Runaway Bride to surpass Julia Robertis other film, Notting Hill this weekend. All box office numbers as of Monday August 23.

▲ Big Hollywood Studios: Rumor had it that due to Blair's enormous success these bullies threatened to make late summer/early fall releases "unavailable" to theater owners who wouldn't move the upstart horror flick out in order to make room for their films. I say good; I don't think I could have handled another jaws rip-off this year.

UMass football eyeing another ring

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Flash back to a year ago last Friday. The Massachusetts football team probably sat in the locker room before their date with Delaware wondering what magic tricks head coach Mark Whipple had in mind to knock off a national semifinalist in the previous year. After all, the Minutemen were coming off a 2-9 disaster that ultimately led to the resignation of coach Mike Hodges. It had been 45 years since they had fallen so far.

Upon arriving in Amherst, he stated that his goal was to guide UMass to a national championship. There were not any guarantees or any sort of timetable. No one could see it coming.

It took Whipple just three hours to get the Minutemen to see things his way. Heavy underdogs, UMass not only competed, but they nearly upset the third-ranked Blue Hens, falling just three points shy in a 33-30 loss. Despite losing, they bought into his system, learning that his goals weren't so far-fetched after all.

Soon came the work ethic, and then the chemistry. Just three months later on a cool afternoon in Chattanooga, UMass would shock the college football world by winning the Division I-AA National Championship, putting together a dream season in one of the sport's greatest turnarounds and feel-good success stories.

This year, however, is much different. The Minutemen have become the target. Every opponent has nothing to lose in going all out. Whipple and Co. have been dealt severe blows by way of graduation, but are still among the favorites to travel south in December. The national polls have taken the losses into account, the Associated Press dropping the Minutemen to second behind only Georgia Southern in the most recent poll, the same team UMass hull-hearted stabs at character development and, dare I say, romance.

Too much time is spent wading through plot points that are neither funny nor interesting, and by the time our heroes are ready to storm Casanova Frankenstein's compound, what little comic momentum Mystery Men had built has completely fizzled out, taking the audience's enthusiasm with it.

COURTESY UMASS ATHLETIC RELATIONS

Once he got the Minutemen believing they could win, Coach Mark Whipple began to guide quarterback Todd Bankhead to a number of school passing records.

On offense, quarterback Todd Bankhead lost a trio of sure-handed targets in Jimmy Moore, Matt Jordan and co-captain Kerry Taylor. The three seniors combined for 215 catches and 2,922 of Bankhead's 3,919 passing yards, a mark that nearly doubled the previous plateau set 11 years ago by Dave Palazzi.

Whipple snatched Bankhead out of Escondido, California, and immediately put him in the center of his complex offensive scheme. Now, after just one year, the junior college transfer is on pace to shatter almost every standing record in the passing department. Despite the departures on his receiving core, Bankhead is optimistic about who will suit up with him when the Minutemen open the 1999 season this Saturday against the New Hampshire Wildcats.

"I think we'll be in great shape with the guys we have returning and the experience we have," Bankhead said. "A lot of the new guys have a lot of talent to go with the experience."

Sophomore Adrian Zullo is back for a second season. Zullo blended his track history with UMass football, providing Bankhead with a deep threat. This year, though, Zullo will have to expand his route library, playing more of a possession role than last season. Junior Steve Ley had 10 receptions a year ago and will have to fill Moore's shoes as the other starter.

Despite overall inexperience, wide receiver may be the position where the Minutemen have the most depth this year. Whipple recruited a number of receivers that will open the passing game up for more three or four wide out sets. Among the frontrunners are junior Troy Lockman and sophomore Eric Bross, who are expected to fill vital backup roles.

At tight end, Sean Higgins made just five catches last season in completing Taylor, but many believe that the tight end spot is in good hands with the senior. After transferring from Cavuga Community College prior to last season, Higgins saw action in every game and provides a big target for Bankhead heading into the Minutemen's defense of the title. Rich Palmese and Greg Ward are big, physical backups that will be used in two tight end formations.

One thing that is certain is that no one has forgotten about Marcel Shipp. Whipple sleeps easier knowing he has his junior tailback in the offensive backfield. Shipp piled up 2,542 yards on the season, picking apart the Georgia Southern defense for 244 yards on 35 carries. After getting out of the gates slowly, Shipp became almost automatic on first and second down. One of the top candidates for the Walter Payton Award, Shipp enters the 1999 season with a streak of 12 consecutive games with 100 yards or more.

The junior has come back 10 pounds heavier and Whipple is hoping to get the same production from Shipp but with less carries per game.

He averaged six yards a carry and we'd like to get that up," Whipple said. "Get his carries down and try to keep him healthy."

UMass found out that Shipp's service should not be taken for granted, as they found themselves without their leader for the opening round of the playoffs against McNeese State. Kevin Quinlan was called upon and proceeded to rush for 147 yards in the victory. Now a sophomore, the Somerville native will look for an increased role in the offense.

Pete Cariello is the unlikely predecessor of Jordan. Last year the redshirt sophomore recorded 51 tackles as a second string outside linebacker, but Whipple has turned to him to pave the way for Shipp.

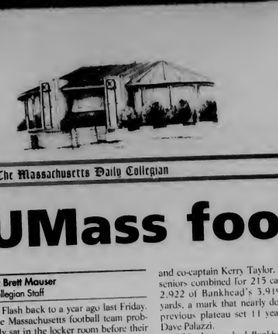
There are two holes to fill on the offensive line with the graduation of center Dwaite Hagood and Mim Hill. Both starting guards return in junior Tyler Laubach and Mike Wynne in a unit that helped spring Shipp for his monster season. Senior tackle Cliff Bolden will be paired with sophomore Corey Mitchell at the tackle spots while redshirt freshman Maikel Mitret secures the middle as the starting center.

When the Minutemen took on Connecticut in Storrs halfway through the season they were not able to hold a big lead. The Huskies scored the final 17 points of the game to post a 44-41 victory in overtime. It was then that the defense began to come together. It was that defense that held McNeese State to four field goals from the red zone and the same defense that forced seven turnovers in the championship game.

It is certain that for the Minutemen to repeat what they accomplished last season, the UMass defense will have to continue where they left off. Just two seniors have left the fold on the defensive side of the ball, one being middle linebacker Khari Samuel, who was taken in the fifth round of the 1999 NFL Draft by the Chicago Bears.

Moving over from the outside and into the middle is junior Kole Ayi anchoring a linebacking core that brings back speed and experience. Ayi stole the show in Chattanooga, recovering three fumbles, including one for a touchdown in the opening quarter. The New Hampshire native used his outstanding lateral movement and quickness to lead the team in tackles with 165.

Seniors Matt Dawson and Dan Healey will sandwich Ayi on the outsides. Dawson begins his second season as starting outside linebacker after taking a step back from the defensive line, while Healey leaves the special teams to become an every down player. It follows a series of position changes for the Worcester Academy grad, who has seen time at linebacker, strong safety and fullback. He recorded a career high eight tackles in the semifinal victory against Northwestern State.



"Everything we do on defense is based on quickness and speed," Whipple said. "All these guys are coming back with 15 games and spring practice."

Chris Price, Aaron Parker, Paul Bolden and Dan Schneider keep the front line intact a year later. The quartet came into their own late in the season holding Northwestern State to 112 yards on the ground and Lehigh to a measly 77. Backup Jamil Thomas returns for his senior year while redshirt freshman Khalil Blakes is expected to see time at tackle. On the ends, senior Joe Abasciano and sophomore Pierre Rosier and Damon Robinson provide depth for a solid defensive line.

While Mike Smith having departed, Willie Hemingway plugs the cornerback hole, supported by fellow senior Jerard White. Jamal Brian Smith and sophomore Jeremy Robinson will roam the defensive backfield as the safety spots. Smith was third on the team in tackles (153) while hung for the team lead in pass breakups (15) and interceptions (three). In nickel situations, Lance Overby should prove to be reliable. The junior took over for Robinson after he missed three games last season

As opposing defenses in 1998 concentrated on controlling senior Massachusetts wide receiver Jimmy Moore, who tied or set eight Minuteman records in his one season with the club, a 5-foot-7, 151-pound speedy freshman named Adrian Zullo not-so-quietly snuck by the backfield to capture Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year honors.

With Moore tying corners and safeties up during the teams National Championship year with 1,492 yards and 16 touchdowns on 92 catches, Zullo darted through for 474 yards and eight scores of his own. Each of his grabs went for an eye-popping 16.5 yards.

In addition, the wunderkind seat-back took 12 handoffs and produced 70 yards rushing, while returning 51 kicks at 22 yards a try.

Zullo's versatility earned him a preseason all-conference slot as a kick returner, as he finished his first collegiate campaign in 10th place on the all-time UMass kick return yardage list.

After the 1998 season finished, however, Moore took his lofty numbers and target status and stepped off the playing field and into the coaches box. The maroon No. 80 that thrilled Minuteman fans for one legendary season will become an assistant wide receivers coach, but will no longer be able to help take the burden off Zullo once the youngster crosses the chalk.

How will No. 2 handle being number one?

"I expect him to do better (than last year)," Coach Mark Whipple said. "He had a real good year last year. We've got to find a place on offense for him! 92 passes are gone from Jimmy, so Adrian's got to pick up his role."

UM field hockey looking to repeat

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Over the last quarter-century, the Massachusetts field hockey team has written one of the true legacies of the sport. While boasting an astonishing 347 victories, the Maroon and White has produced 29 All-Americans and advanced to 16 of 18 NCAA Tournaments. So as the team gears up for the 1999 season, it faces the somewhat daunting task of building upon a 25-year tradition of excellence, and not simply resting on it.

Third-year coach Patty Shea is no stranger to field hockey at such an elite level. One of the most decorated players in UMass history, Shea was the Minutewomens starting goalie in the first-ever NCAA Field Hockey Tournament in 1981. Over her four-year collegiate career, Shea posted 54 shutouts and a 0.617 goals-allowed average while earning first team All-American honors twice.

In her first two seasons at the helm for UMass, Shea has compiled an impressive 27-18 record and guided her team to back-to-back Atlantic-10 Championships and NCAA Tournament berths. Her 1998 squad racked up 14 wins in 22 contests, including a nifty six-game winning streak during the month of October that saw UMass outscore its opponents by a combined score of 22-2.

The season highlight was undoubtedly the A-10 Championship game, which pitted UMass against the Rams of Rhode Island. URI had bested the Minutewomen in a gut-wrenching 2-1 overtime game on October 22nd, snapping the aforementioned win streak and dealing the Maroon and White its only conference loss of the year.

A far different scenario would unfold at the A-10's, however. UM goalkeeper Zowie Tucker showed true mettle in the net, shunning seven of eight Ram scoring attempts with an array of breathtaking stops. The Massachusetts offense, meanwhile, shifted into overdrive and peppered the URI goal with a staggering 24 shots. UMis Vicky Browne and Kristen Schmidt each found the Ram net twice, giving the Minutewomen the championship by a final score of 4-1. Afterward, coach Shea credited her team's competitive fire as the primary force behind the title run.

"In a tournament situation; plays and skills don't matter as much as emotion and desire," Shea said. "Every single one of our players showed that; and stepped up when they had to."

Heading into the '99 campaign, Shea's troops are gearing up for a fierce title defense despite the loss of several key players to graduation. Gone are co-captains Browne and Kate Putnam, as well as All-American forward Erica Johnston. With only a handful of seniors on the '99 roster, Shea feels confident that third-year stars like Schmidt can solidify the Maroon and White's front line.

"As a group, we are starting to bring in more speed and versatility," Shea said. "Kristen Schmidt's speed and stick skills make her a force up front."

The UMass midfield should also reap the rewards of younger, more enthusiastic players, with sophomores Kaitlyn

Ex-Minutewoman Scurry takes on world and wins

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

At the University of Massachusetts, women's soccer goaltender Briana Scurry made 368 saves, second only to Danielle Dion all time.

Over five years after her graduation and hundreds of saves later, Scurry made arguably the biggest save in the history of United States women's soccer. In the most attended event ever in women's sports, drawing 90,185 onlookers, the former Minutewoman dove in front of an overtime penalty kick by China's Liu Ailing in the Women's World Cup Final.

It turned out to be the winning stop in the game. US midfielder Brandi Chastain subsequently put a penalty kick into the Chinese net to end the spectacle at 3-3, kicking the already highly-publicized event into the next gear of commercial success.

For her part in the championship effort, Scurry was invited to appear on "Good Morning America", "The Tonight Show" and "Live with Regis and Kathy Lee". The UMass alum also graced the covers of USA Today and People Magazine, enjoying a level of national exposure rarely seen by former Massachusetts athletes.

In short, she's come a long way since her stay in Amherst.

"She was a really cool kid," UMass Coach Jim Rudy said. "Nothing seems to phase her. She gives the appearance that nothing can bother her. She's like a rock that you cannot climb."

As that rock in the cage for the Maroon and White, Scurry climbed to near the top of just about every career goaltending list the school has. No Minutewoman has ever recorded more shutouts in a single season than Scurry, who totaled 15 in her senior year, 1995. That same year, she made 124 saves, a count bettered by only two other UMass goalies.

Over her career at Massachusetts, Scurry claimed a shutout in 37 different games, second all-time at the school.

Despite the lofty stats, things were never handed to her at UMass.

"We actually recruited her to be one of two goalkeepers," said Rudy. "We were looking to get a second goalkeeper."

Scurry battled with teammate Skye Eddy for the starting position for a number of years. Eddy, one year ahead of the future World Cup champ ended her career ranked No. 5 on the UMass career save list herself. Eddy's 1992 goals against average, 0.41, was a hair better than any of Scurry's season's efforts, but over the course of four years between the pipes, the former was bested, 0.56 to 0.68, by the latter.

It is to her time at Massachusetts and the guidance of Rudy that Scurry credits her success.

"Jim Rudy is the best goalkeeper coach in the world," Scurry was quoted as saying in The Maroon and White. "He's amazing. He took a player with a lot of athletic ability – not so much on the goalkeeper side – and molded me. If it wasn't for him, I wouldn't be here. I give him all the credit in the world."

"It's great that my players are so loyal, and that they have a good memory of their time here at UMass," Rudy said in reply. "I'm just a part of that experience... Those are really great compliments. And things like that are what keep you going."

The goaltender's notoriety since leaving the Amherst campus might, in itself, give back to the program from which she came.

"We hope it's going to help [in recruiting]," said Rudy. "I think a lot of people have re-opened their eyes to UMass, and the soccer and educational experience here."

As Scurry thanks Rudy for his coaching, Rudy plans to thank his former goalie for her school loyalty.

"We're trying to finalize her return to UMass," Rudy said. "We're trying to organize a Bri Scurry weekend. At this point in time it will be our first home game.

"Our plans are to recognize her at the start of our game and/or at halftime. That evening we plan to have a reception/banquet for her, our team and her soccer family. The chancellor is planning on doing something with her at the halftime of the football game, and then another banquet.

The schedule for her here is still tentative. Nothing has been finalized."

Going by that logic, Scurry would return to Massachusetts on September 18, when the Minutewomen take on Alabama-Birmingham at 4:30 p.m. as part of the UMass Classic. Such an appearance would likely heighten an awareness for women's soccer in Amherst, highlighting a push by Rudy to raise the fan base of his team, to level it enjoyed while Scurry still played here.

The coach mentioned such attractions as pizza giveaways and maracas to be at UMass women's soccer games this fall, and is considering having T-shirts thrown into the crowd each time the Minutewomen score a goal. The festivities must be finalized, but it is clear that Rudy is attempting to make the games "fun" for area residents and students to attend.

All part of the upward spiral caused by the relationship of two of the most talented soccer personalities in the world.

Cross country teams prepare for a big year

Leaders gone, but UM count on Somers, depth

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Without a preseason camp to work out the kinks, Massachusetts cross-country coach Ken O'Brien is not asking for the world from his team from the get-go. The team will have two days of practice before taking the road, and with the loss of key leaders from last year's 4-1 squad. With time though, it is expected that the Minutemen will return to contension behind some new faces.

With captains Dan LeBoeuf and Brian Chabot having graduated, new faces have moved into the spotlight. Seniors Kevin Somers and Sean Murphy, both of which played vital roles in last year's run to the NCAA District I Qualifier, are expected to take over the reins and guide the team through the 1999 campaign.

"They have a great deal of experience and hopefully they've learned their lessons well," O'Brien said. "They are very capable and understand that a big key to our season is their leadership."

Somers finished all six meets last season among the top two Minutemen to cross the line, topped by a 3rd place finish in a split with Iona and Northeastern. His fourth place finish overall helped guide the Minutemen to a victory in their quad-meet with Boston University, Maine and Vermont. Murphy put up good results on a consistent basis, placing third among UMass runners in the New England Championships. He will be called upon to step up as the bar rises.

Joining the two captains is senior Matt Ely, who is back for a fifth season. For the second straight year, Ely was the second UMass runner to cross the finish line at the NCAA Regional Qualifier.

"Matt's a solid top five performer," O'Brien said. "We are going to count on him not just for his ability but for his leadership."

Looking to add onto last year's success are sophomores Kevin Curtin, Colin Baughman and Ryan Corbett. The trio made giant steps in solidifying the future of Minuteman cross-country. Baughman finished well in the Northeast Regional, placing third, while Corbett, who finished fourth, came on at the end of the season, finishing fifth among Minutemen runners in the Atlantic 10 Championship. Curtin was named Most Outstanding Rookie at the conference championship, finishing first among newcomers.

"We have a real solid group of sophomores who are really going to provide a lot of scoring punch," O'Brien said.

Juniors Brendan Sullivan and Thomas Stuart are expect to play important roles in the Minutemen's march to Philadelphia.

In 32 years as the team's coach, O'Brien has guided the Minutemen to 15 Yankee Conference championships and three New England titles. O'Brien, though, has not reached the conference pinnacle since 1995, a year where the UMass alum won Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year honors.

"Our conference is better and I think we can respond," O'Brien said. "I think our mental tenacity and desire will give us a shot."

UMass travels to Chestnut Hill to take on Boston College, Connecticut, Iona and New Hampshire before doing battle with Boston University, Vermont, and Maine the following weekend. The Minutemen took first against the latter opponents last year, placing seven runners in the top 10.

UMass looking to add fifth title to full A-10 resume

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Very little is left for speculation for the Massachusetts women's cross-country team heading into 1999. Coming off a fourth consecutive Atlantic 10 championship and a solid NCAA showing, the army comes back all but fully intact to shoot for number five, and in the eyes of coach Julie LaFreniere, even more.

With only Tracy Meagher falling victim to graduation, the Minutewomen come back strong with a senior trio that promises to shoulder the load in a season where a New England Championship could be a realistic goal.

Seniors Sally Hirsch, Sharon Tillotson and Nicole Way return as tri-captains with all the experience needed to guide the Minutewomen. Both Hirsch and Tillotson have earned all-conference honors for the past two seasons, while Way is back for a fifth season after having placed in the top five in every race.

Complementing the trio will be junior Melissa Henderson, arguably the Minutewomen's most consistent force last season. Henderson placed second or third in five of six races in 1998 and looks to improve upon that figure.

In 1998, LaFreniere got what she expected - great senior leadership, outstanding support from the underclassmen, another conference crown. But freshman Kristen Cisowski curiously walked on to the Minutewoman squad and became the team's most dominant force down the stretch.

Cisowski topped off a stellar debut on the cross-country scene by capturing the Atlantic 10 individual championship, becoming the first freshman to accomplish the feat in conference history. A field hockey and track and field athlete in high school, Cisowski placed in the top seven throughout the season before making her big splash in Philadelphia.

"She had a super freshman year and now she just needs to do what she's capable of doing," LaFreniere said of the New Hampshire native.

Senior Lizzie Sherpyck is the sleeper of the 1999 campaign. Sherpyck finished second at both the A-10 and New England Championships during the spring. Sophomores Katherine Blais and Sarah Thoms also look to contribute after solid freshman campaigns.

Last year, the Minutewomen had a rather sluggish performance in the NCAA Eastern Regionals, coming off an emotional victory in the conference championship. Disappointed after last year's performance and the base of last year's squad returning, LaFreniere wants to take it another step.

"Last year, it took so much out of them to dig down and come up with the same performances [following the Atlantic 10 Championships]," she said. "We have a very experienced group and we want to put it together for the regional.

"We've got a highly motivated group coming back. They compete with a lot of heart and guts," she said. "It's all a matter of how badly we want it."

Kristen Cisowski and Sally Hirsch will be looked to as leaders this season for the UMass womenis cross country team.

New faces in Denver, Miami D

Brett Mauser on the NFL

The Mile High City must not be able to watch much television these days. It must hurt more so than usual. John Elway has turned down the chance to wear No. 7 again to become Coors' spokesman, getting air time that stretches far beyond Sunday.

Last season, head coach Mike Shanahan was more concerned about Elway's fragile body than Elway himself. Now, after repeating in the Super Bowl, Shanahan begins the defense of his title with Brian Griese, whose name captures respect, and the ageless Bubby Brister, whose name is, well, it's Bubby, for pete's sake.

Last Monday, Shanahan handed the keys to Griese after he completed 12 of 17 passes for 128 yards and two touchdowns. Taking into account that Griese has thrown just three career passes in professional uniform, Shanahan is skeptical about handing the reins over to the Michigan alum just yet.

Griese will have to grow up early, as Miami comes to Denver on Monday night in the opening week. The Broncos then visit Arrowhead and Raymond James Stadium, two of football's most hostile environments.

With Rod Smith providing a deep threat, Ed McCaffrey standing 6-foot-5 and the best tight end in the game in Shannon Sharpe, Griese's targets don't get much bigger or much better. Florida's Travis McGriff has opened some eyes in camp while playing on special teams. He is still a question mark, though, for third-and-long situations.

With the quarterback's overall inexperience, Terrell Davis, whose history rivals that of the Oilers' Earl Campbell's early years, piling up 25-30 carry games on a weekly basis, won't get any breaks. His heavy workload is expected to remain the same, if not increase as the Broncos vie for a playoff spot with the toughest schedule out there.

A comparison to Campbell would seem honorable and Davis' production would put up wins anywhere, but Shanahan has no other choice but to run Davis two out of three downs. Campbell, unfortunately, slowed down and retired prematurely. Davis, who has either beaten or played through serious migraine headaches that limited his ability in college, will become the focal point of the Denver offense, if that already was not the case last season.

While Davis has yet to be blindsided by the Curse of the Dawgs, one has to wonder how much longer even he will be able to hold it off. Georgia graduates Robert Edwards and Garrison Hearst are fending off rumors that their season-ending injuries will also take out their careers.

In three attempts, Elway could not win without a player of Davis' caliber in the backfield. Put Davis on any of Elway's previous three Super Bowl teams and you've got a five-time winner. This year, all of football will discover whether Davis' victories hold any weight without Denver's emotional leader in the huddle.

Mile High Stadium does not seem so mythical anymore. While the thin air remains, the mystique has diminished with Elway's departure. When you think Broncos, you think Elway. You think of his game-winning drives, patrolling the arena where two-touchdown leads go to die.

The Broncos should be thrilled to come out of the first half of the season with five wins, having to play five playoff teams from last year and two near-misses on the road when they take on Oakland and Tampa Bay. Their mettle will be tested when Green Bay, Minnesota and the Jets come to Mile High in a five-week span.

While the playoffs still seem like just about a sure thing for the two-time defending champions, the Broncos are walking the thin line between Super Bowl number three and mediocrity.

What's the over/under on Dimitrius Underwood retirements? The first round draft pick out of Michigan State is creeping up on fellow Spartan Magic Johnson for comeback attempts.

In mid-August, the Miami Dolphins picked Underwood off of waivers and signed him to a contract with a tremendous pay cut after he proved in just a short time that his mind is on far more things than just football.

Now, the 'Fins must be unaware that commissioner Paul Tagliabue has yet to call a vote on whether or not there should be a league-wide quota of goons a team must acquire to have overall team spunk. After all, it has been proven that "spunk" is hardly a far cry from "punk."

They heard the whispers of Randy Moss in their head and had seemingly reformed projected starting running back Cecil Collins. They made their first mistake with Lawrence Phillips two years back, which was understandable considering what their backfield had to offer. Underwood's acquisition was, at the very least, a pipe dream for the 'Fins, as he was too occupied to attend his first slated day of practice.

Without having even played, Underwood has already drawn comparisons to Cowboys defensive tackle Leon Lett, who was drafted in the seventh round by then-Cowboys and current Dolphins headman Jimmy Johnson, with the same question marks about his mental stability. Lett, despite his famed Super Bowl blunder, has turned into one of the NFL's most dominant pass rushers. Johnson is hoping to get the rebound he got from Lett after he had been ridden by public scrutiny.

Whether Underwood plays or not, the Miami defense is arguably the gamois best, but depth could become an issue on the defensive line, as both Jason Taylor and Trace Armstrong return from injury.

No time for losers, 'cause we are the champions plays left-handed, creating havoc on the court. Meanwhile, he lacks consistency on his groundstrokes, but Dixon feels that will come with more experience.

The National Champion UMass Minutemen will take to the gridiron to defend their title against New Hampshire on September 11.

"He"s got terrific hands and heis extremely quick at the net," Dixon said, "but he needs to make sure that he comes out every day because there are no easy matches at No. 1."

Senior co-captain Bo Navarro is coming off an 8-11 spring campaign. He will pair with Prisco at No. 1 doubles. Navarro returns in shape and ready to go after posting his best season last year.

Beyond the top two, the lineup is up in the air. Dixon is faced with the tough task of ranking a team with incredible balance.

"[Parity] makes my job easier because no one's job is safe," Dixon said. "It makes them much more intense when they go to practice because they donit take things for granted."

Leading the pack is senior co-captain Parsa Samii. Before being sidelined with a broken thumb, Samii posted a mark of 3-6 in the spring.

At his heels is junior Fabian Rabanal, who saw extended time at No. 2 and 3 last season. The Minutemen were dealt a blow when Rabanal broke his pelvis in a van accident, keeping him out of action from February to July.

■ women

Helana Horak and Annie Hamilton will be dueling for the nod at the No. 2 spot for UMass. Horak will be looking to improve on a freshman campaign that saw her post an 8-9 record. The mark does not justify her performance as she was being shuffled between the No. 2 and 3 spots in the lineup.

Hamilton, also a sophomore, has played all summer long in collegiate tournaments. She posted a 10-6 record last spring and is expected to move up the ladder.

"The person that Iim going to need to step up this year is Annie," Dixon said. "She's a very talented player."

Fighting for the fourth slot will be junior co-captain Robyn Lebovitz and freshman Katie Stammen. Lebovitz is coming off a stellar sophomore year, which saw her end the season at 11-7. Stammen is expected to have an immediate impact.

If there is a weakness to the 1999 version of the racketeers, it is in the doubles department. After pairing Gerasimova and Horak all of last season, Dixon has placed Gerasimova with Hamilton, dropping Horak to second doubles. No. 3 doubles is also up for grabs heading into the season.

With the ultimate goal being a spot in the ECAC Championships, the Minutewomen begin their journey at the Syracuse Invitational this weekend, which will pit them against some of the Northeast's top competition.

Byron and Jill Fantasia standing with junior Lucy Koch at the forefront of that position. In the backfield, Shea will look to junior Patty Robinson to shoulder much of the defensive responsibility, with help from UM's "international connection" German Anke Bruemmer and Kerry Ann Jaggassar, who hails from Trinidad and Tobago.

"I think the international experience in the backfield will help. Anke plays like a seasoned veteran, which is somewhat surprising because she is [an underclassman]," Shea said. "And Patty Robinson is a great utility player for us."

Welsh junior Tucker will return to patrol between the pipes for UMass, backed up once again by Pennsylvania native Michelle Crooks. Shea seems least concerned with this position, where depth and talent abound.

"Zuwie Tucker has the potential to be one of the best goaltenders in the country," Shea said. "Michelle [has] stepped on the field and produced, and is well respected as a team leader. I'm confident with our goaltender situation."

The Minutewomen face a somewhat fearsome schedule this year, loaded with worthy adversaries and road games at Duke, North Carolina and Syracuse among others. A season-opening stretch of five straight home games began on September 1st, in a showdown between UM and the Red Raiders of Colgate at Richard M. Garber Field. The Minutewomen invite cross-state rival Boston College to town tonight at 7 p.m. before entertaining Maryland in a matinee start on Sunday. Rhode Island will provide the Maroon and White's first A-10 opponent, at home on October 9th.

"We know what our potential is, and how well we can play when we focus," Shea said. "Our group has a lot of pride in wearing the UMass logo. That shows the caliber of [the] players and the history of this program."

after he missed three games last season due to injury.

One of the Achilles' heels for the majority of last season was the kicking game. With Matt Murphy departed, the starting job is sophomore Jason Cherry's to lose. His late-season success all but secures him the position; despite Doug White's emergence has a solid candidate. Punter David Sanger impressed onlookers in the intrasquad scrimmage in August. He looks to fill the big shoes left by senior Andy Maclay.

"We're putting more expectations on our guys in the fact that we don't expect them to make as many mental mistakes and that's what we're harping on right now," Whipple said. "We feel like we have a first team that's pretty sound all the way through."

"His role is definitely going to be expanded. We had him at the 'X' receiver all the time, and that's probably the easiest place to learn in our offensive system. Now we actually want to be able to move him around so that if people want to double him, they'll have a little bit more difficult time."

As the only starter remaining on the UMass receiving core, Zullo will likely be looked to as a guide in practice and in the huddle - a position the sophomore is not uncomfortable with.

"I want to be a leader, and it's good to be a leader" Zullo said. "If it happens, it happens, but you can't always get what you want."

"He's a real confident kid," said senior quarterback Todd Bankhead, who will be in charge of getting the ball to Zullo. "He wants the ball more than anybody, and he was like that last year. There's no change. He'll need to step up and make the plays he needs to make."

The Pompano Beach, Florida, native made it clear in the short time he's been wearing Massachusetts threads that he can play under pressure. Against the fifth-ranked Hofstra Flying Dutchmen in the fourth game of the 1998 season, Zullo hauled in a 15-yard touchdown with three seconds to go to push the Minutemen past the hosts with a 40-35 victory. During that game, however, Moore was there to help the cause with 11 catches and 164 yards.

"I losing Jimmy is a big part of our team," said Zullo. "He did have 92 receptions (last year)."

"Adrian will be fine," Moore said. "A lot of guys are there to help him. I'm just there to get him some tricks of the trade."

Starting alongside Zullo will be junior Steve Ley, who, with 10 receptions and two touchdowns a year ago, is no stranger to the offensive system.

"The coaches are hoping everybody gets 40-50 passes each," Zullo said. "I'm out to do my part (to) help the team succeed."

With a national title behind them and a tough schedule in front of them, Zullo's 5-foot-7 shadow will have to stretch a little further to make up for the loss of a receiving giant.

comes in the form of seniors Jill Meyers and Kari Hogancamp, who form the most lethal attack tandem since Dionne Nash and Giza Rivera teamed up 1995. Both made an immediate impact as freshmen, starting in all 37 matches.

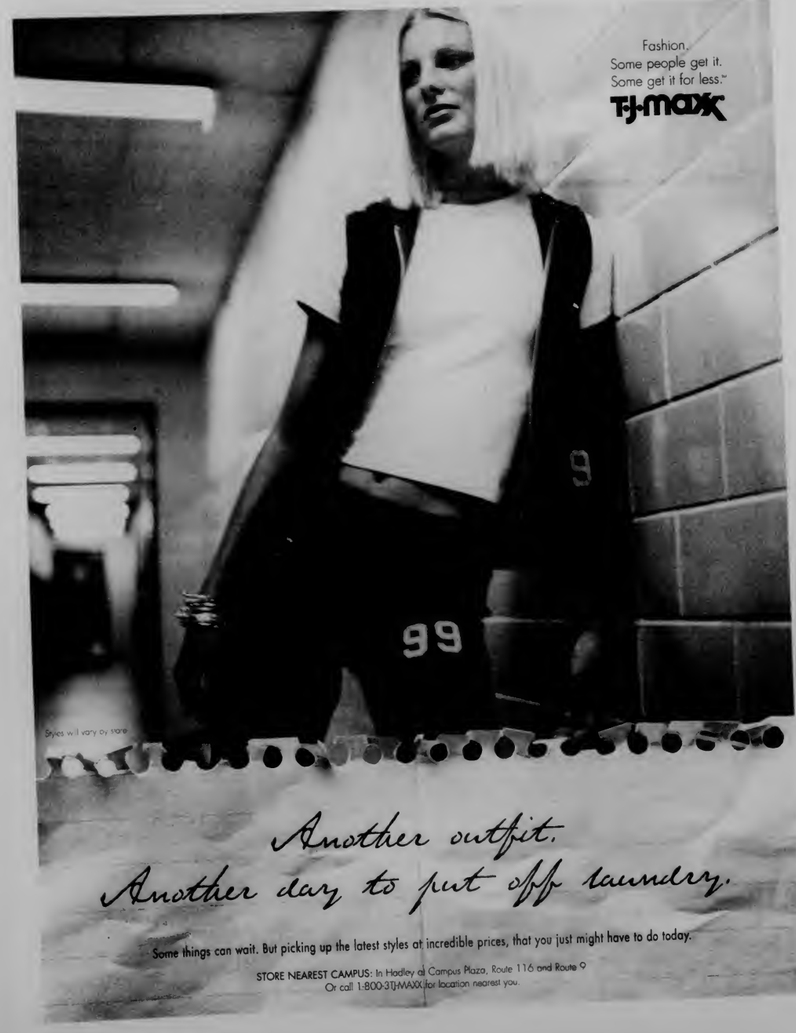
With 1,304 kills through three years at UMass, Meyers is on pace to break Nash's all-time kill record of 1,673. She is also within striking distance of the Michelle Paciorek's total blocks mark. Hogancamp, who has been atop the national dig rankings for the past two seasons, needs just 29 more to take over the Minutewoman career mark.

Meyers and Hogancamp have formed a special bond in leading the team the past two years. Both from Huntington Beach, California, they have just a year to improve upon two sub par seasons fit at least in UMass volleyball standards. In 1996 as freshmen, the team recorded 28 victories, equivalent to the amount the team has posted in the past two seasons combined, both 14-win outputs.

Junior Rebecca Hasson came on last year, finishing third on the team in kills, and is expected to consistently provide a third hitting force at the net.

"She has the potential to be a dominant attacker," Kenny said. "Physically, she's gotten stronger, having played a lot over the summer. I think she'll be much more effective at the net."

Hasson came back from injury to play in 18 games as a freshman before coming into her own. At the net, the Riverside, Cal., native will prove to be not just an attacking force but also a great blocker.



The Minutewomen will run a different offense altogether, switching over to a triangle formation. This move is attributed to an added depth on the attack, with sophomores Janeen DeMarte, Celia Wiste and Lauren Vander Veen having developed into solid hitters. Outside hitter Lymarie Llovet returned from a knee injury in 1997 to record 125 kills, becoming a secondary attacker on offense.

"We will be able to fill different slots that will free up Jill and Kari," Kenny said. "These people have come along and we now have enough that can attack the ball effectively."

Junior Jennifer Drennan and sophomore Heather Holtsberg will split time passing the ball, with Drennan adding the "defensive specialist" title to her roster status. Holtsberg was the primary setter last season, averaging nearly 11 assists per game last season. She took over the starting job for good last season when the Minutewomen took on Harvard in a non-conference battle. Two years ago it was Drennan who set the UMass freshman record for assists per game, but since she has worked on her defense and has earned the respect of Kenny as more than just a passer.

Following their trip to southern California, the Minutewomen return home for the UMass Invitational on September 10th and 11th. There they will do battle with Seton Hall, Southern Mississippi, New Hampshire, and Michigan State before opening up the conference schedule.

The Minutewomen played without a senior last season and it showed, as they were outscored 16-7 in sets four and five last season, adding up to a 5-12 record in matches that went beyond three sets. Their non-conference record was just 3-7. With everyone a year older, inexperience should not be an issue and UMass is in line to eclipse the 20-win plateau since that '96 season.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) - The road before you may seem long, but you can measure your progress in small increments and feel that you're making real headway. Perception is everything, so put on your spectacles.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) - Don't let yourself be a "nay-sayer" today. The moment you think a negative thought, focus on the positive right in front of you. Smile a lot... or else.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) - It may be difficult for you to get back on track today, but you'll feel as though the stars favor your efforts once you set foot outside the door. With that in mind, perhaps you should never go back inside again.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) - You can keep distractions at bay today, and have enough going on around you to keep you fully interested and entertained. Still, no matter what else is happening, make sure to remember to take your socks out of the dryer.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) - Avoid bitterness today at all costs. You can't afford to make a potentially difficult emotional situation even more difficult. Be supportive. Hugs work wonders, but don't let the hands wander.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) - Once you take the time to look around you today, youull realize a few things that could help you come up with the right answers to some very hard questions. That's right, Waldo is behind the brush.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) - A slow, organic maturation may be resulting at this time in the form of a subtle change of attitude, and someone close to you is likely to notice today. Tell them you have no idea what they are talking about, and sound convincing.

Veteran women's soccer team hoping to return to form

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

You will have to forgive Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy if he seems to have a cautious outlook for the 1999 season.

For a team that failed to make the NCAA tournament last year for the first time since 1990, the Minutewomen have a plethora of returning talent that is looking to help UMass return to the post-season. Add a few newcomers to the mix and with a handful of veterans that missed action last year due to injury returning, the likelihood of improving on the 10-11 mark of 1998 seems inevitable.

However, according to Rudy, there's no need to hand the Atlantic 10 crown over to UMass just yet.

"I'm being cautiously optimistic because last year at this time we did some of our best attacking. Then we found out that we had problems defending," said Rudy, who is beginning his 12th season at the helm of the Minutewomen. "Right now at this stage things are looking good, but I remember what happened last year. That's why I'm trying to remain cautious."

But with a squad of old and new faces, UMass appears ready for early season tests against Albany, Syracuse (who is coached by former UMass standout April Kater), Alabama-Birmingham and Texas Christian. The latter two teams, along with the Minutewomen and Harvard, will comprise the four-team field of this year's UMass Classic, which will take place at Totman Field on September 10th and 12th.

"The pre-season has been high-paced, high-pressured and high excitement. We've got 20 people that are playing at a very similar level and they have created a pressure-packed training environment because everyone is so close in ability," Rudy said.

Leading the UMass offense up front will be senior Emma Kurowski and junior Kara Green. Both Minutewomen were All-Atlantic 10 selections in 1998 and will be two of the teamis top scoring threats. Sophomores Katelyn Jones and Kristi Robicheau each saw time in the upper-third of the field for UMass last year and should contribute once again this season.

The midfield spots will likely be filled with familiar faces. After missing all of last season because of a knee injury, senior captain Robin Smith is back for the Minutewomen and will anchor the Maroon and White on the field. Fellow classmates Tarah Tokarchik and Cindy Garceau will also be battling for time in the midfield, along with junior Kathleen Machamer and sophomore Sarah Cook. Junior Brooke Bartlett missed the majority of last year with a broken collarbone, but is another healthy option for UMass.

In addition to the return of Smith, Kate Webb and Martha Conover will help solidify the UMass defensive unit. Both Webb and Conover also missed all of last season with knee injuries, but should be important pieces to the puzzle for the Minutewomen in 1999. Other returning defenders include junior Anna Morozuk and senior Sue Nord.

"The good part is that we're not going to have to go through what we did last year as far as losing people and not having anyone to back them up. We've got depth in the back, in the midfield and up front," Rudy said. "Last year"s team was one of the closest I've ever had because of the injuries, but this year is going to be the true test of their commitment to the team."

"How committed is someone going to be if they aren"t playing as much as they are used to? That's going to indicate the type of people that we have," added Rudy. "We need everyone to be committed whether they are playing a lot, a little, or not at all."

A few fresh faces will also be looking to make an impact for UMass. Freshmen Melissa Ganias, Maggie LaBrode, Alexi Rudd and Holly Wildenhaus all signed on the dotted line last winter to become the members of the Class of 2003.

"[The newcomers] are definitely going to bring us athleticism and speed. They are integrating very well into the mix and some of them are already making an impact," Rudy said. "I think that all of them can push for playing time and/or starting roles."

Finally, either senior Angie Napoli or sophomore Cori Stevens will patrol the territory between the pipes for UMass. Last season the two players shared the starting job for the majority of the campaign.

The Minutewomen began the season with a 2-0 defeat of Harvard in an exhibition match. Kara Green continued the success she enjoyed last season, scoring the first goal, while Kate Webb joined her in the scoring column, returning to action for the first time since playing in 1997.

UMass played Albany last Wednesday and Syracuse over the weekend in the first two games of their 18-game schedule. Following the aforementioned UMass Classic this weekend, the maroon and white will head down to Williamsburg, Virginia, to play in the William & Mary Classic. The final non-conference match up for UMass will take place on the 24th when regional rival Connecticut arrives at Totman Field.

It is after that the Minutewomen will open their conference schedule with a home date against Rhode Island before packing for a four-game road trip which will give Rudy an idea of where his team will be come early November when the Atlantic 10 Tournament comes Amherst.

"We're hoping to do much better than last year. We want to make people recognize that last year was an aberration - not a rule," Rudy said. "We need to play quality soccer and I'd like to see us reduce our goals against average to under one if we can. Our goal is to retake the Atlantic 10 and requalify for the NCAA's. After that we'll take it one game at a time."

Fowler, UMass attempt to erase memories of '98

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Youth will have to carry the Massachusetts men's soccer team this season, as the Minutemen lost four key seniors from last year's 4-12-2 team, a team that many believe was much better than the record stated.

One would think that with the loss of such seniors, the Minutemen would be hurting for bodies to step in, but ninth year coach Sam Koch projects that his squad will be back challenging for the conference crown.

"We have a good solid core that I think really improved in the spring," Koch said. "We've got a good young group, but with a young group you never know."

Senior Todd Fowler will begin his third year between the posts for the Minutemen. Last season, he registered three shutouts and turned away 76 percent of the shots he faced. His senior leadership will be the backbone of a young Minuteman team. Last year's offense scored just 19 goals to support Fowler in net.

Koch knows that in Fowler he has a reliable leader on and off the field. In 1997, Fowler was 3-1 against nationally-ranked opponents.

"He wants to end his career by going out on top," Koch said. "He wants to make sure that last year never happens again."

Koch suffered through just the second losing season of his career, as it took the Minutemen 13 games to post their first win, a 1-0 victory at George Washington.

Sophomores Adam Black and Fred Kinateder are expected to carry the load on offense, returning after leading last year's squad in goals scored. Black, a transfer from Cal State-Fullerton, notched five goals in the final four games, three of which were wins. Kinateder will step into the starting lineup after starting just seven games last season, posting three goals and one assist.

The offense will go without Seth Lilburn for the early stages of the season, as he continues to battle back from a season-ending knee injury and also an ankle injury that Koch believes has to do with returning prematurely. The New Jersey native set a UMass freshman record with eight assists in 1997.

In the midfield, seniors Todd Baron and James Redmond will be looked to for leadership. Redmond, a Springfield native, was third on the team in scoring a year ago and will contribute on both ends, while Baron's crafty play-making ability should trigger the UMass offense.

The Minutemen enthusiastically welcome defensive specialist Jonathan Bibb back to the lineup. Bibb missed ten games in 1998 with shin splints. As a senior, Bibb's return provides senior leadership for an otherwise suspect backfield.

"We have to work at getting behind the ball, pressing the ball," Koch said. "On offense, we're going to score, but our defense is what starts our offense."

Koch snatched two solid defensive players from the south in South Alabama transfer Patrick Beattie and freshman John Lytton, who was named the high school Gatorade Player of the Year in Mississippi.

Sophomore Mike Janusz, who played in all 18 games last season, looks to fill holes left by the four departing seniors. Janusz did not register a point last year, but Koch believes his role is vital to the team's success.

"I feel that he has really improved," Koch said. "We need him to step forward and I see him being a strong addition."

The Minutemen's out-of-conference schedule will be an accurate litmus test as they travel to New Hampshire, Jacksonville and Hartford before tangling with Boston University and Washington at home. In the Atlantic 10, the likes of Rhode Island, Xavier, and Dayton are certain to stand in between the Minutemen and their first conference title since 1994.

Prisco, Navarro to fill big holes

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

In welcoming back a solid core that would put the Massachusetts men's tennis team in a position to challenge for supremacy in the Northeast region, Coach Judy Dixon will have to find a way to replace the cornerstones of Minuteman tennis for the past three seasons.

She knew she would lose senior Todd Cheney, the all-time winningest doubles player in team history, but she would later learn that she would be without the services of projected No. 2 Rob Manchester, who will not be able to play due to academics.

Manchester had a 12-7 record for the Minutemen last spring and was named to the Atlantic 10 All-Conference team for the second straight year. Coupled with the loss of Cheney, the Minutemen will be looking for someone to step in and fill the void vacated by their two vocal leaders.

"It's always tough when you lose two at the top," Dixon said. "Rob's loss was unexpected. He would have probably anchored No. 2 doubles."

UMass will be looking to improve upon a sub par spring that saw the Minutemen post a 7-10 record.

Sophomore Steve Prisco has a stranglehold on the No. 1 spot after tackling the task of taking the top spot as a freshman. He played ahead of both Manchester and Cheney and posted a respectable 7-12 mark, winning two of his three singles matches in the conference tournament.

A pure serve-and-volleyer, Prisco serves right-handed but

Big shoes to fill for UM women

By Bryan Smith

"It's like rolling the dice again," Coach Judy Dixon said of the 1999 version of the Massachusetts women's tennis team.

The young Minutewomen squad sports a new look this year, looking to improve on the 7-7 record it posted in the spring. It lost three vocal leaders when Jackie Braunstein, Gillian Kane and Michelle Kuhr graduated in May, but Dixon is not worried about this yearis version.

The Minutewomen suffered a devastating loss when sophomore Allison Tross decided to leave the team to concentrate on her academics. Tross was returning to action after breaking her thumb in a van accident last February.

"I was looking for her to play higher up in the lineup," Dixon said. "Alli's loss is huge blow to the team."

Ola Gerasimova will be looked to fill the shoes that were vacated. The senior had a 9-7 season in the spring, but Dixon is looking for bigger things from Gerasimova.

She will be playing in the No. 1 slot and facing the toughest competition that Minutewomen adversaries have to offer. The Greenfield native was named to the All-Atlantic 10 Championship team for the second straight year, emitting a positive vibe for the upcoming season.

"She took some early losses last year and she didnit regroup well. She needs to rebound to come out firing," Dixon said. "I'm looking for her senior year to be a great year."

UM water polo leads Eastern pack

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The revolving door for the Massachusetts water polo team continues to shovel All-Americans out and add new ones to the mix. This year, though, head coach Russ Yarworth must find a way to plug the most gaping hole left in team history.

At the two-meter position, Brian Stahl was all but automatic, leaving school as UMass water polo's all-time leading scorer. The Minutemen finished the season 27-6 (9-1 Collegiate Water Polo Association), winning their fifth Eastern Championship in six seasons. With three of the team's top four scorers having departed with their degrees, things will run a little different this year in the pool.

"We're going to have a little different style on offense," Yarworth said, noting the necessary adjustments his team must make. "It used to be that we'd get the ball into Brian and let him go to work. This year we're going to be a little more diverse on offense."

This year the Minutemen will trade Stahl's superstar status in for great depth and versatility on the attack. Despite overall youth at two-meters, Yarworth expects that his squad won't lose a step.

After scoring 17 goals in his freshman campaign, sophomore Greg Trayer will be the main weapon on offense at two-meters.

Leadership will be provided by senior co-captain Cory Koenemann, whose size and strength will backbone the unit.

Junior Brook O'Neill's experience will come in handy after registering 234 quarters in his first two seasons, as the veteran will likely be looked to for guidance.

Sophomore transfers Mike Foley (UC-Irvine) and Adam Moore (USC) bring size and West Coast collegiate experience to the fold. Both are expected to log quality minutes from two-meters.

Moore redshirted his freshman year in 1997 and was on the roster for the Trojansi national championship squad last season. On their way, they handed the Minutemen a 12-3 loss in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

"We will be able to show teams a couple of different looks at two-meters, especially on defense, to keep them guessing," Yarworth said. "With our depth and versatility, we will be able to go with speed and then change it up with size."

While overall size will dominate the two-meter position, Yarworth has what he believes to be the greatest team speed he's seen in his 13 years at the helm. Senior Timmy Troupis registered 60 goals and 19 assists from the right side last season, the leading returnee. He and Koenemann will team with senior Rich Slingluff, who scored the deciding goal in UMass' 11-10 overtime victory over Queens College in the Eastern Championship game, a team that handed the Minutemen two of their three regular season losses.

After Villanova dropped its water polo program, senior Pat Kain took his services to Amherst and will form a strong tandem from the right side with Troupis. Kain is one of the top players on the east coast and should contribute immediately.

Sophomore Carlos Ramos and freshman Brady Hahn bring international experience to the table. After leading the team in assists in 1998 with 30, Ramos played with the Puerto Rican National team over the summer, including an appearance in the Pan American Games. Hahn's time with the U.S. National Youth Under 17 B team puts him in great shape to step right in to top collegiate competition.

Worldwide competition does not stop there. In fact, senior co-captain Richard Huntley, a teammate of Ramos' in the national team, does not have much left to prove to himself or to the college water polo world. Huntley made 248 saves in 110 quarters, good for honorable mention All-America honors. He is second in career saves at UMass with 571.

"Richard Huntley is the top goalie on the East Coast and one who can hold his own nationally," Yarworth said.

The national title is certainly within reach for the Minutemen, as Yarworth's system allows underclassmen to step in for seniors past. If everything goes to plan, UMass will add a sixth eastern crown to the mantle, but finding its way to San Diego for the NCAA championships should be the bare minimum that Minutemen fans can expect.

Despite residing on the east coast, the Minutemen proved they could play out West with the big boys when they traveled to the NorCal tournament at Stanford and knocked off Santa Clara, 12-7, before bowing to Pepperdine.

Their march to the West Coast began this past weekend in the Navy Invitational. The Minutemen take the pool again this weekend in the CWPA Invitational.

The answers will come quick. With two highly touted seniors returning with a solid supporting cast on their shoulders, the Massachusetts volleyball team will head west to discover where the 1999 campaign might take them.

Before tackling a brutal conference schedule, the Minutewomen meet national powerhouses Long Beach State, Cal-Santa Barbara and North Carolina in the Long Beach State Invitational. Coach Bonnie Kenny, in her sixth year at the helm, expects more of her team coming off of a 14-15 season.

"I don"t think our goal should be anything less than a conference title," Kenny said. "We have pretty good experience returning. We just have to make sure that everyone comes day in and day out ready to play."

Whitmore feels the impact of housing shortage

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

An increase in the number of students wanting to live in University of Massachusetts residence halls resulted in Labor Day weekend lines stretching out the doors of the Whitmore Administration Building.

Increases in retention rate and incoming transfer students combined with a freshman class numbering over 4,000 to produce the unexpected leap in students living on campus this semester, according to Michael Gilbert, Director of Housing Services.

Students without permanent housing assignments made up the weekend lines. Those first in line were assigned permanent spaces in residence halls, while others were assigned to residence hall lounges or rooms in the Campus Center Hotel, University Motor Lodge or Howard Johnson, according to Thea Costine, Housing Assignment Manager.

"Our primary concern today is to give everyone a bed to sleep in," Costine said Monday.

But a bed to sleep in may not have been enough. Students waiting in line with friends and family were unhappy with the housing situation and the wait to remedy it.

"I thought I'd have housing, but that didn't happen," said Patrick Davis, a sophomore landscape architecture major who said he wanted to live in the Southwest Residential Area.

"I'm not happy to be waiting in a line like this," said Stephanie, a sophomore transfer business major who was not assigned housing for the fall. She waited in line three hours before getting to speak with a representative from Housing Services.

Lines outside Housing Services are a "perennial experience," said Gilbert. He said it has "always been the case" to house students in temporary spaces. The major difference between this year and years past was the number of students needing to be housed in the so-called "swing spaces."

According to Gilbert, Housing Services set up 100 extra beds in the residence halls and 100 in the Campus Center Hotel last year. This year, 300 extra beds were set up in the residence halls, 100 were set up in the Campus Center Hotel and 82 were set up in other hotels.

The number of returning students who do not notify Housing Services of their plans also contributes to the housing crunch. Some juniors and seniors reserve rooms but do not move into them in the fall, while others do not reserve rooms and turn to Housing Services in the late summer or early fall to get a space in the residence halls, said Gilbert.

As Housing Services tallies the number of "no-shows," staff will assign students to the empty rooms.

The situation has been worse, said Seth Avakian, Student Trustee. Avakian said students have camped out on campus lawns and cots have been set up in gymnasiums.

If there is a "significant number of displaced students" after a certain amount of time, the Student Government Association plans to propose that a limited number of sophomores be permitted to live off campus, according to Avakian.

Police eye pedestrian safety

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police will be focusing more closely on enforcing pedestrian safety by educating drivers about the consequences of disobeying crosswalk laws, and granting $100 fines to vehicles failing to stop for a pedestrian in a crosswalk.

UMass Police explained their enforcement plans at a public safety initiative held on campus yesterday.

"Today's a big effort because we have two horses, a bike, a designated cruiser for enforcement and an officer on foot," UMass Police Officer David Black said Tuesday.

Last year, two UMass students died due to pedestrian-related accidents. In both cases, the drivers failed to yield at a crosswalk. Since then, there has become an increased awareness on campus to address the issues behind pedestrian safety.

"I never really noticed how many vehicles don't obey pedestrian laws," Black said. "The high number of pedestrians compared to the large number of vehicles coming on and off campus is a concern for safety."

Yesterday's program included the introduction of a new laser-radar (LIDAR).

Past tracking devices involved sending radar waves that would bounce off vehicles and register the speed on the radar. The only problem with this device was its inefficiency with long distances, as the waves would bounce off other objects and terrain.

Now, with the help of the newly efficient LIDAR, on loan from the Safe Roads of Hampshire County, UMass Police can track the speed and distance of any vehicle with accuracy. In fact, it takes only a second for the speed to register on the radar with the help of a laser point.

By using the LIDAR, Black expects that he and the other officers will come into contact with about 200 crosswalk violations in less than five hours. Black said he also enforces the Massachusetts seat-belt law and discovered that for every 50 students he pulled over, only one-half were wearing their seatbelts.

It is because of these concerns for passenger and driver safety that officers like Black are now taking action to make drivers aware of the importance of adhering to such laws. In the near future, UMass Police will be processing data on the busiest intersections around campus and will be focusing most of their attention on enforcing these areas.

Other traffic safety measures have been taken at the University.

SGA optimistic about future

By Sam Wilkinson

As students roll back into Amherst and onto the University of Massachusetts campus, the Student Government Association (SGA) is readying itself for the upcoming year. With a host of issues on the horizon, everything from keeping students up to date on search and seizure issues to the planning of the spring concert, SGA members say that this year will be a successful one.

Mike Orbillard, Speaker of the SGA Senate, is excited about the year after spending a summer working on various issues that surround his position.

"I got the SGA up and running, and I'm working to improve the somewhat tarnished image of the Senate," Orbillard said.

Issues facing Orbillard this semester and next include, as he put it, "working on the residence halls as usual," but also safety, a possible fall event and fighting for students rights.

"Student rights are a big key," Orbillard said. "We're working hard with Housing Services on the housing contract, as well as a referendum during fall elections that would raise the price of cable access $15 over three years, but add new channels."

While those new channels are as of yet undecided, Orbillard mentioned both ESPN and HBO as possibilities.

He will also be working on safety issues, including the Safety Walk. The walk, during which students and administration get together to walk the campus and find possible safety hazards such as "an uncut shrub or a corner where there needs to be a callbox," Orbillard said, will be held on Oct. 5.

Orbillard is positive about the reaction that the Safety Walk gets, noting that recommendations made during past safety walks have been the catalyst for the addition of new phones on campus.

"What happens is that we note where there might be a problem on campus, and then we make recommendations and send them to the Safety Summit," Orbillard said. The Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Facility Services, the Chief of Police and others sit on the Summit, according to Orbillard.

Students can also expect the continuation of the Spring Concert. Last year's show brought KRS-1, The Mighty Mighty Bosstones, Strangefolk and Cypress Hill to perform before approximately 8,000 students in the Mullins Center.

The SGA Senate is also looking toward issues surrounding the Commonwealth College, including the low numbers of minority students, as well as the possible privatization of the Campus Center.

"My main concern is that the issues that surround privatization, including service, cost to students, survival of student business and student jobs, are considered to be equal if not more important than the bottom line," said Seth Avakian, UMass's student elected representative to the State Board of Trustees.

As far as the Commonwealth College is concerned, Avakian feels that it needs to be more sensitive to the needs of students on this campus.

"They have views for what students need that are highly inaccurate," Avakian said, adding, "Linda Nolan [Director of the Commonwealth College] needs to be more open to students."

East Timor violence continues

By Keith B. Richburg
Washington Post

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Indonesian soldiers and their allied militias in East Timor pursued yesterday what diplomats and others described as a "scorched-earth" policy in the capital of Dili, blowing up bridges, looting abandoned houses, setting fire to telecommunications facilities, hotels, the radio station and other sites, and leaving the city in smoldering ruins.

International patience with the Jakarta government appeared to be wearing thin as Indonesian officials rejected calls for armed peacekeepers in the troubled territory. U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright warned of "very serious effects within the international community" for Indonesia if it fails to end the crisis.

In a reflection of the chaos in Dili, the United Nations first announced the withdrawal of its 206 remaining staff members from its besieged headquarters compound in Dili, then postponed the move for 24 hours and said a skeleton staff is likely to remain.

In New York, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan voiced his concern for about 2,000 East Timorese who have taken refuge in the compound and said a residual U.N. presence would help protect them. "The place is in chaos, and they need to be able to get out," he said.

Since East Timor voted overwhelmingly on Aug. 30 to become an independent state, the Indonesian army and police force – now working openly alongside armed militia gangs – seem to have adopted a strategy of letting East Timor separate, but only after emptying the province of its population, killing off the political elite and destroying its basic infrastructure.

In Dili yesterday, one witness described "a scene of utter destruction," and some compared the pillage to the Khmer Rouge guerrillas' takeover of the Cambodian capital of Phnom Penh in 1975.

Indonesia, the world's largest Muslim nation, invaded the predominantly Catholic former Portuguese colony in 1975 and annexed it a year later, beginning an often brutal occupation that is believed to have cost 200,000 lives. President B.J. Habibie took a major political risk earlier this year by announcing a referendum in the tiny territory, allowing East Timorese to choose between autonomous status within Indonesia or independence. Elements within the Indonesian military organized and supported anti-independence militias who conducted a campaign of intimidation and terror before the referendum and have intensified it since the results were announced – overwhelmingly against remaining part of Indonesia.

"It's scorched earth, it's ethnic cleansing," U.N. spokesman David Wimhurst said yesterday in a telephone interview from his new base in Darwin, Australia.

Clinton proposes firearm program amidst skepticism

By Ronald Brownstein
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON – Opening a new front in the debate over gun violence, the Clinton administration will announce today the federal government's largest effort to buy firearms now in private hands, the Los Angeles Times has learned.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development will provide $14 million in grants to police departments and public housing authorities in at least 20 cities, enabling local officials to buy back and destroy as many as 280,000 guns.

"While you are working on reducing the sale of guns to people who shouldn't have them, you also have to do something about reducing the number of guns that are currently in circulation," HUD Secretary Andrew Cuomo said Wednesday.

Since some cities have drawn criticism for reselling guns purchased in buy-back programs, the HUD initiative will require municipalities to agree to destroy any weapons they buy, officials said. Only stolen guns – which will be returned to their legal owners – or guns needed for police investigations will be exempted.

Gun buy-back programs have become increasingly popular with mayors and police chiefs in recent years – though there is little decisive evidence of their effectiveness. Hoping to provide firmer answers, HUD plans to spend $1 million on a study of buy-backs, including its own new program.

President Clinton is scheduled to announce the gun initiative in a ceremony at the White House. At the session, mayors and police chiefs from around the country will join him.

The local officials also are expected to lobby lawmakers in support of gun control measures that the administration wants passed, including a controversial proposal to impose strict new background check requirements on all firearm transactions at gun shows and pawnshops. The proposals have remained stalled in Congress since the Senate approved them in May, responding in part to the public outcry that followed the shootings that took 15 lives at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., a month earlier.

The new buy-back plan will use existing federal funds and congressional approval will not be required. Cities and public housing authorities that want to participate must apply to HUD, which then will provide grants based on an evaluation of the proposals. HUD officials said that they intend to disburse the first money by November.

The program drew cautious applause from law enforcement and gun control groups but was greeted with skepticism from the National Rifle Association.

"This is certainly not the answer to our problem but it does help and we have to use and adapt any reasonable method we can to reduce the level of violence in these communities," said Hubert Williams, president of the Police Foundation here.

Wayne LaPierre, the NRA's executive vice president, said that the group is "not opposed" to buy-back programs but considers them mostly "sound bites and photo ops" that have no "impact on a criminal ... or a violent juvenile that wants a gun." Rather than investing in buy-back programs, LaPierre said, the administration could do more to discourage gun violence by increasing funding for prosecuting violations of existing gun laws.

Supporters view buy-back programs as a way to reduce the number of guns in circulation and in particular an opportunity to reduce the risk of accidental shootings by removing guns from homes. Critics consider the programs a largely cosmetic effort unlikely to have much impact in a nation where more than 200 million guns are in circulation. "You can't make a dent," LaPierre said. "What you can make is a headline."

Critics and supporters alike agree that buybacks tend to attract weapons from law-abiding citizens, rather than criminals. But program proponents maintain that, even removing old family guns buried in the attic can reduce the risk of shootings.

"It probably has less effect on people with criminal intentions," said Naomi Paisse, communications director for Handgun Control, Inc., a leading gun control advocacy group. "But, if we save even 20 kids a year from an accidental shooting because an old gun has gotten out of a home, that's certainly worth doing."

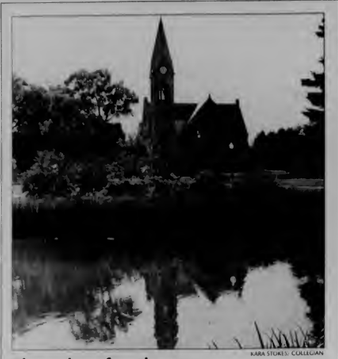
This year alone, buy-back programs have been launched in New York City, Washington and Atlanta, as well as smaller cities such as Dayton, Ohio, and South Bend, Ind.

Cuomo said that conversations with municipal officials made clear that more cities would pursue gun buy-back programs if they had the funds for them. "Funding is a barrier to communities who want to do this," he said.

HUD will encourage, but not require, the cities participating to pay no more than $50 per gun ... which could stretch the $14 million to cover as many as 280,000 guns.

Students who travel should plan ahead

By Barbara Shea
Newsday

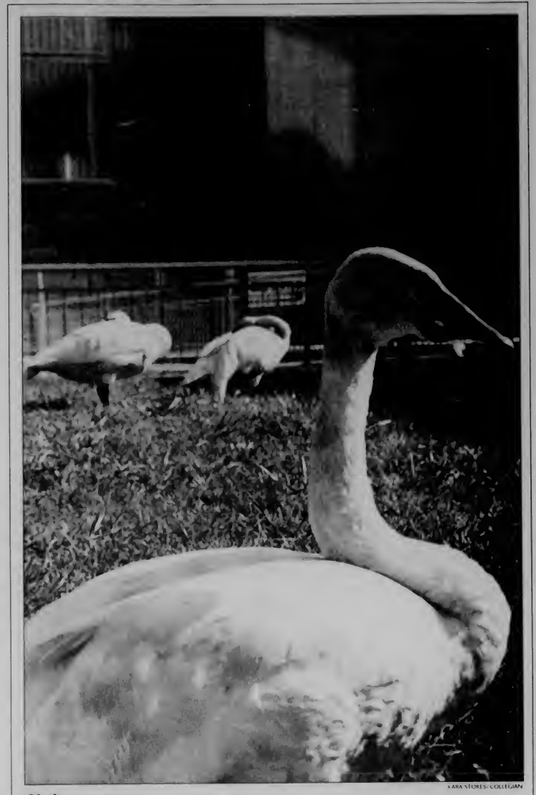


After the bookstore and the student union, returning college students often head straight for the nearest travel agent to find the cheapest ways to shuttle between home, campus and ski/beach/foreign culture breaks.

Few airlines design deals specifically for students any more, knowing that the youthful cyber set is automatically a major beneficiary of Web-based short-notice discount fares. But today's tightly scheduled collegians can't always risk waiting to see if a good rate will show up for their destination at the last minute.

TWA's Youth Travel Pak offers savings to those age 14 to 24 who book at least 14 days in advance. For $548, you get four coupons, each redeemable for one-way travel between any two cities served by TWA or Trans World Express within the continental United States or between continental U.S. cities and San Juan, Montego Bay, Santo Domingo or Toronto (travel to Hawaii and back will use up two coupons each way). The coupons are good for a year and currently have few restrictions (you can't travel during certain hours on Sundays or anyime the Wednesday before or the Sunday after Thanksgiving). You also get a Europe Bonus Certificate for 20 percent off any qualifying published adult fare. Credit-card issuers however, still often target students with a variety of special offers. American Express has two student cards that come with travel deals. One has no annual fee but charges interest if you opt to pay bills over time; the other has a $55 annual fee, must be paid in full each month but has no preset spending limit and adds extra benefits. Both provide certificates that enable flights for as low as $159 round-trip within the same U.S. zone (there are three zones). Prices vary by date and destination, with peak-season international travel naturally the most expensive. Student-oriented services such as STA Travel, the world's largest such organization, remain the best central source of bargain trips and information. STA offers U.S. airfare deals to students under 26 in conjunction with Continental Airlines (tickets are good for three months, date-changeable for $25). Example: Newark to Los Angeles for $350 round-trip through November (except Nov. 25 or Nov. 28-30).

Thanksgiving may sound like a long way off, but savvy students are already thinking spring break. You've got to book before Dec. 15 to get the best discounts to hotspots such as Jamaica or Cancun, Mexico. STA spokeswoman Laura Stegeman said. STA is also introducing a new European Spring Break with Virgin Airways that will offer incentives for purchasing early, she added.



Just beware of fly-by-night vacation-charter operators, whose leaflets invariably start appearing on college bulletin boards about the same time as midterm grades. Before booking any getaway, gather background on the provider – from consumer agencies as well as other students. And consider travel insurance that will cover the cost of a prepaid trip that gets canceled – whether by you or a bankrupt tour operator.

Welcome back to the town of Amherst

Yes, we enjoy the slower pace of a summer in Amherst. But university and college students are what make Amherst the great place that is to live, work and play, and we welcome you back to our town - our town and your town.

Relations between the Town and the University are probably at their all-time best, and University stdents have played a big part in that accomplishment. Student activities such as arts and athletics have always provided culture and entertainment for townspeople as well as for members of the University community. Students have always provided many volunteer services, both on an indivdual and a group basis. The student firefighters and EMTs have provided vital services to the Town for many years. The annual, spring "Into Amherst" day has been the most visible way for large numbers of students to provide services to the Town you live in, and there are others too numerous to mention.

Some students have also participated on Town boards and committees and at Town Meetings. One such committee, a Community Partnership on alcohol-related issues, has been active for almost three years. The Partnership, including representatives of students, landlords, administrators of the Town and educational institutions, and other citizens, is very aware that the incidence of alcohol-related problems in town was considerably lower last year than in recent years. Educational efforts and the University's new alcohol policy on campus certainly had an impact that may have spilled over off-campus.

But what we want to emphasize is that in the final analysis, it is the students who are responsible for last year's reduction in alcohol related problems, and we thank you for that. Whether it was a new University policy, awareness of recent alcohol-related tragedies a UMass and other campuses, or any combination of factors, it appears that students enjoyed college life last year without frequent or serious alcohol-related incidents, and we hope that the same will be true this year.

We also want to give you a "heads up" about parking in and around downtown Amherst. A new system of permit parking will soon be in effect in areas surrounding downtown and in a few residential areas near the University campus. (You are eligible for a permit if you work or live downtown or live in one of the residential parking permit areas.) Enforcement of all parking regulations has been increased, including tickets for "mete-feeding." (A one-hour limit is a one-hour limit; time limits for parking at meters cannot be extended by "feeding" the meter again. This has been enforced in Northhampton for many years.) Please abide by parking regulations, or use the buses that your student fees pay for or the new bicycle lanes and racks downtown.

Thanks again from the Town of Amherst, and have a good year.

Editorial/Opinion

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian September 9, 1999

Ah, those tourists...

Hi, everybody. I hope you all had a ridiculously good summer and that you are now euphorically happy to be back at UMass.

Okay. Enough with the small talk. Summer is quite possibly more work than the school year is – no joke. Confused yet? Let me elaborate.

I worked eleven hours a day on average, and yes, I did the math. I worked at two jobs, both in Freeport, Maine. One was at a sunglass shop, named, quite cleverly, "The Sunglass Shop" (they were going for abstract, I think), and the other was the Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream Shop in town.

I must confess, my coworkers at both jobs were oodles of fun, and the managers I worked under were accommodating and even-tempered and whatnot. In fact, the entire summer of working retail/food would have been an absolute hoot if it weren't for one simple component: the customers.

As a Communications major under esteemed professors like Sut Jhally and Lisa Henderson, I know that it is my job – no, my civic duty – to formulate new and amazing theories in the field of human relations, so as to give the university all sorts of good press because (and I realize this is somewhat of a run-on) its students are doing brilliant work.

After a season of work in Freeport and literally minutes of intense contemplation, I've come up with this new and amazing theory: tourists are dumb.

Now, before you send me all sorts of verbally abusive letters because, you, as a dumb person, are infuriated about being associated with tourists, hear me out.

I have convincing stories of customers, usually from incredibly wealthy families with several-jillion-dollar mansions in the beautiful hills of some random exotic place, doing dumb things.

Convincing story of customer from incredibly wealthy family with several-jillion-dollar mansion in the beautiful hills of some random exotic place doing a dumb thing Number One:

The tourist asked for two small vanilla cones (no, that's not the dumb part). The mission if I chose to accept it (no, I really didn't have a choice), was to assemble these complex pieces of frozen goodness and distribute them to the tourist in question. See, my part of the process is very complicated.

Upon making one cone and handing it to the woman, she asked, in her most intelligent and probing voice, "Which one is this?"

True story. How does one answer that question without making the valuable customer feel like she has slightly less mental capacity than a tree stump? After thinking about it for almost a full minute, I decided that there really was no way, and answered, "Oh, I'm sorry. I got you the second one first. Let me throw that out for you!"

I, then, obviously, gave her a "what kind of a moron are you" look and began to scoop the second cone.

Convincing story of customer blah blah blah Number Two:

The customer was wearing a collared shirt that was embroidered on the left breast with the company logo stating the inspiring slogan "Attention to Detail." The man asked to see three pairs of sunglasses, and after careful inspection, stated confidently, "So, I guess these three are pretty much exactly the same."

Well, the tourist was absolutely right... at least in the respect that all three pairs had glass in them. The frames were different, the sizes were different, and the colors were different. Otherwise, the three were dead ringers for one another.

Attention to Detail, huh? I am painfully sorry if that guy is out there reading this article and it turns out he is blind.

Convincing yadda yadda yadda Number Three:

Supposing that you, the attentive reader, has never been to Freeport, Maine before in your entire existence. I tell you now that the Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream Shop there is right next door to a behemoth of a place named L.L. Bean, which, for those of you who have arrived at UMass after having lived in a cardboard box for 17-or-so years, sells camping equipment and outdoor-oriented things.

Seth Koenig

Well, I kid you not, customers come in every day and ask where L.L. Bean is. The comparable UMass reference would be someone standing at Machmer Hall and asking where the 28-story library is.

You get the idea Number Four:

The most commonly asked question at Ben & Jerry's is (drum roll, please) "What's in the Vanilla Chocolate Chunk?" (laugh track please).

If I were completely out of the loop, I would make an uninformed guess that the flavor would have in it Vanilla with Chocolate Chunks. But that's just me. It could very well consist of pickles and mustard, but I would doubt it.

Number Five:

The customer, clearly with a Masters in the applied sciences, demanded a large vanilla milk shake – but without the milk.

Why, you ask? I don't know, I reply. If the woman was lactose intolerant, she wouldn't be getting an ice cream product at all, one would think. Then again, one would also think that being wise, mature and over 40, as this woman was, she would understand that it is impossible to make a milk shake without the milk. It is obvious that one has no idea who one is dealing with, here.

I calmly explained that simply putting two immense scoops of ice cream into an industrial powered blender would only produce two immense scoops of gnawed up ice cream with little, if any, change in the consistency of the original scoops.

"Could I drink it through a straw," she inquired, proving that she missed the point altogether.

"Sure." I pictured myself saying while flogging this mental midget with a bat. "That would be easy to do, provided you have a straw that rivals the diameter of oil derrick."

"No," I said in reality.

That's the great thing about being a columnist, as a matter of fact. Through the wonderful medium of the newspaper, I can completely avoid issues of any substance and distribute to tens of thousands of people the things I would say to dumb tourists if I wasn't getting paid to make them feel good about themselves.

While I've got you here, I'd also like to say that if any of this offended you, I don't care in the slightest. Thanks for reading, and welcome to school.

Hey, we're back!

Hey, UMass! How the hell are you?! Did everyone have a fun summer? Did everyone miss the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) rallies and protests, the ever-so-frequent obsession with Chancellor Scott? Well, I sure as hell did. But we're back now. Back to the zoo and back to the life that is unique to UMass.

I came back here a week ago and am now moved into my house off campus. And, boy, am I psyched about being "off campus". The dorms were fun for the first year, but I guess I got sick of public vomiting after a while. Everything's starting out great so far, but something's missing. It's not my roommates, because they're great. My roommate "Durone" is a borderline alcoholic, "Pretentia" has an unhealthy obsession with Winny the Pooh, "Red" honestly thinks that WWF is real, and "Shaquitta" told us she loves cereal so much that she could "munch on a box for hours." Now that's a quote!

Gary Mendese

> "'Shaquitta" told us she loves cereal so much that she could, "munch on a box for hours." Now that's a quote!

But like I said, my roommates are great. What's missing on campus is the controversy. It's missing the wacky issues and events that make UMass a one-of-a-kind place to be. There was a ton of "fun stuff" happening on campus last year, and I can't wait for it to get started again.

For those of you that don't know about the "interesting" things that happened at the University last semester, allow me to fill you in. And for the rest of you reading this column that are thinking, "Talk about something new, you idiot. No one cares about last year," you can bite me. I've got the microphone right now, so deal with it. (Damn, it's good to be back!)

So where was I? Oh yeah... last semester. Well, 1999 began with that whole impeachment issue. "Did you have sexual relations with that woman?" First of all, have you seen that woman (Without the beer goggles, Pres.)? She looks like something out of the Island of Doctor Moreau. Anyway, there was much debate on campus as to whether or not President Clinton lied and should be removed from office. No one really cared that we were bombing Iraq, probably starting World War III. Well, even if he slept with the boar, did he really need to be impeached? I think the walk of shame is punishment enough.

Hey, have you seen the new and improved Fine Arts Center (FAC)? I haven't either. You know why? Because it looks the same. Oh, aside from the cool neon lights and the lack of construction vehicles. Yes, the University spent 1.8 million dollars improving the FAC, but did it really need it? So much money spent on one building? Well, can the Morrill Science Center get a little some some? Have you seen the rooms or the infamous N329 lecture hall? Can you say fusion bomb? It looks like Kosovo in there!

Look, I know that improvements need to be done throughout campus, but I think the funds need to be dispersed more fairly. But I suppose it's too soon for rational decisions.

Finally, the most pressing issue on campus last semester was the reformation of the Affirmative Action policy at UMass. The new policy focuses not only on race but more so on socioeconomic status as a deciding factor on admission to the University. Oh, there was many-a-protest on campus, and emotions were a-flying. Well, I won't give you my opinion on "affirmative" action because I don't really want to bring up old issues. (If you really want to know, you can ask one of the many people that sent me hate mail in response to my column last semester or those that are probably using my column for target practice.)

So as you can see, there was a whole lot of shaking going on here at good ole' UMass last semester. But fear not! I'm sure there will be plenty of controversial, pressing and emotional issues on campus soon, so keep your cool. I'm fairly sure that there will be plenty of alcohol related issues and a ton of GEO protests (because this need cream to get rid of diaper rash). There will be housing chaos as 400 students are "homeless" until the end of the infamous room freeze in a couple of weeks. The Student Union steps will be used as a soapbox for manic narcissistic, self-indulgent groups on campus, and the "freaky Jesus people" will be coming around soon to personally inform the entire campus that everyone is going to hell.

Sound exciting to you? Me... hey, I can't wait. This is my last year here at UMass and I'm sure I won't be disappointed. As long as the heat is on, I'm a happy guy. I'm looking forward to the multitude of issues plaguing this campus and I hope that you're touched by them like I have been. And not the way your priest used to touch you... but that's an entirely different issue altogether.

Bike path Nazis

There are few things in life that represent what is good and pure in the United States of America these days. I mean, how many things are there that truly make you proud to be from this land in which we live? I'll concede that baseball, Dunkin Donuts, Chinese food and backyard barbecues make me stop and think how great it is to be an American. However, there is one thing that not enough people equate with the glory of our homeland. It has been a fixture in our society for years. It has helped us to live the kind of lives that people in other countries constantly envy. Hopefully by writing this editorial, I will bring to light an oversight that most American citizens have made in their lives. This oversight is the fact that most Americans do not fully appreciate the invention of the bike path.

Dan Viens

In the Amherst/Northampton area we happen to be extremely lucky to be able to take advantage of the miracle of modern technology that we call "the bike path". Each and every one of us should thank God on a regular basis for helping us to create the wondrous bike path. I'm sure that there isn't a single one of us who doesn't have some fond memories from one bike path or another. Bike paths are places where one can't help but revel in the pleasantries of life. Bike paths can turn frowns upside down; they can make a gray sky blue. Bike paths are where the rainbow ends and the glass is always half full. Bike paths can be enjoyed by people of all ages, races and creeds. To this writer bike paths are an integral and positive part of American society.

However, there are some anarchists about who feel that the Amherst/Hadley bike path is a negative and corrupt part of our world. This group of people, which includes farmers, housewives, postmen and short order cooks, has developed enough support to get a referendum question about removing the bike path placed on this November's election. If the referendum passes then the bike path will be ripped up and they're going to put up a barbed wire fence for kids to play on.

> "Kyle Hitler is a great man who had a dream, a dream of a bike path that would help us prosper as a community and as a country."

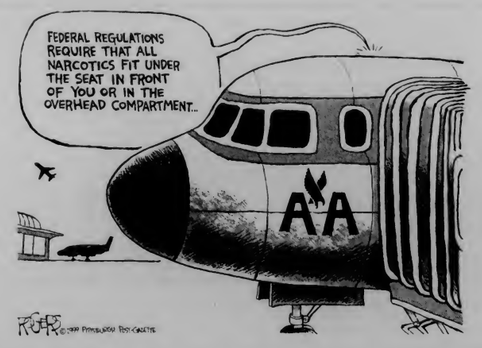
There are two main reasons that these ingrates have decided to try to undertake such a horrific feat. The first reason is the method by which the bike path was paved. First of all, the tar they used had raw eggs in it. The purpose of that is to keep the tar nice and healthy. However, now because of the eggs, when it gets real hot out, the tar seeps fried egg and people always fall off of their bikes. Also because of the eggs there is an odd odor coming from the bike path.

One local farmer named Reginald Molbreat was quoted as saying, "That damn bike path been killin' all my steer." He believes that the toxic fumes emanating from the bike path have been killing off his herd of steer. I don't really see how rotten egg mixed with tar could be killing hundreds of cattle. After all I'm sure that it could have to do with the severe drought that gripped the valley this past summer. Or maybe it's the meals of chili he feeds his steer.

Farmer Molbreat doesn't believe that the malfunctions of the bike path are a mistake. He believes that it is part of a Nazi plot against the local citizens. When the problems first came about we went straight to the contractor who designed and laid the tar for our glorious egg-filled bike path. Molbreat was shocked to find out that the contractor's last name was Hitler. He then hired a supposed expert genealogist to see if they could trace this Hitler back to the infamous leader of the Nazi party, Adolph. It turns out that Adolph Hitler's grandniece is married to the contractor. The reason his last name is Hitler is because when they got married he changed his name from his maiden name, which was Dahmer. Keith Hitler, the contractor, knew that with either name he would have trouble, but he went with Hitler because he figured that name wasn't as fresh on people's minds as Dahmer. He also pronounces it "H-I-T-L-A-R" like the way you would pronounce the name Larry.

It is simple to see that Keith Hitler has no ties at all to his grand uncle in-law. Not only does he not pronounce the name correctly, but he won't eat any German food or watch any German athletes compete during the Olympics. He continues to insist that the egg/tar combination is the best combination for bike paths. He said that the reason for the egg is to cut down on glare from the sun and to keep the bike path rather soft to prevent wear and tear on tires and to do away with injuries from falls.



Keith Hitler is a great man who had a dream, a dream of a bike path that would help us prosper as a community and as a country. His dream was for kids to never come home crying with skinned knees. All he wanted was a bike path that didn't hurt people's eyes when they looked down at it because of a glare from the sun. Indeed, it was a lofty dream, but he did succeed. Sure sometimes it looks and smells like fried eggs, but if that is the only price we have to pay for making a truly extraordinary dream come to life then I say, "So be it!"

Mr. Molbreat and a group of others do not feel the same way however. They are trying to take away our local treasure. They say the egg aspect and the association with Hitler is reason enough to tear up our bike path. I say that even if we had to consult Satan himself we should still keep the bike path. Molbreat's party has launched a campaign to get rid of the place so many of us have learned to love. They picket at all of the entrances to the path. Now when we try to get on the path it's like we are walking into an abortion clinic.

They have concocted all sorts of propaganda to get the voting public on their side. However, this columnist will not stand for it. I'm asking all of you students, professors and citizens of Amherst and Hadley to stand up and be counted this election day. If you aren't registered to vote, it's not too late. Just go to town hall and register. Then on Tuesday November 2, 1999 let's get up and stand for what we believe and vote no on question 7. Save our beloved bike path. Don't let us be pushed around and have a local legend torn away from us.

"Downtown (Dili) has been destroyed. All the commercial areas have been burnt out, looted. ... It's very organized. The whole thing was organized from start to finish."

At the U.N. compound in Dili, water and food were in short supply, and a U.N. convoy that had left the headquarters to retrieve water from a warehouse turned back when militia members with M-16 assault rifles, machetes and clubs, attacked it. Indonesian soldiers stood by as thugs dragged a driver out of a truck and threatened to kill him, according to a U.N. spokesman in New York. All the vehicles' windows were smashed.

"The situation on the ground has become untenable," Wimhurst said, speaking before Annan's statement in New York.

Referring to the refugees at the U.N. complex in Dili, Annan said, "I am taking measures to see if we can thin out rather than withdraw completely, so that we can maintain our premises on the understanding that the military around the building will continue to provide protection."

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer, asserting that Dili now resembles Phnom Penh of 24 years ago, said, "There are almost no local people around at all."

A Western diplomat here in Jakarta, who was in Dili until Monday and still receives regular reports from there, said, "They're definitely doing a scorched-earth policy, destroying all the assets."

The goal, he said, appears to be "destroy everything, leave you guys with nothing, and then give you your independence."

The campaign of destruction has occurred despite – or perhaps because of – the imposition of martial law in East Timor Tuesday and the introduction of thousands of fresh combat troops. Diplomats and others had hoped the new troops might begin to rein in their militia surrogates and restore some semblance of security, instead, they seem to have openly joined in wreaking devastation.

"The militia and military together are just burning and looting," said a Western diplomat. "There's no more distinction between the two."

There were also more reports, from diplomats in Jakarta as well as anti-Indonesian East Timorese leaders here, of mass killings in East Timor, but these could not be independently confirmed; communications links to the province, with the exception of satellite telephones, have been shut down. Several student leaders in Dili were feared dead, and there were concerns for priests who had been sheltering refugees in the southwestern town of Suai.

UM loses former pres.

Michael Hooker, former president of the University of Massachusetts, died on June 29 in University of North Carolina Hospitals from complications resulting from lymphoma. He was 53.

Hooker served as president from 1982 to 1985. At the time of his death, he was serving as chancellor of the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill.

"President Hooker worked tirelessly to make public higher education a priority in Massachusetts, helped to secure more funding for the five-campus system and set new directions for the University, which will be felt for a long time," said Chancellor David K. Scott in a written statement. "His death is a great loss for the entire higher education community."

Hooker was diagnosed in January with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, a cancer in the lymph system. After a medical leave of absence in April, Hooker resumed his duties as chancellor in June.

Hooker is survived by his wife, Carmen, of Chapel Hill, N.C.; his daughter, Alexandra, of Baltimore, Md.; his mother, Christine Hooker, of Roanoke, Va.; and his wife's two daughters, Jennifer and Cyndi Buell, both of Charlotte, N.C.

Plant has been working towards engineering better accessibility ramps in crosswalks, more visible signs and better safety in many of the intersections across campus.

Even with these improvements, the attitude of drivers towards pedestrians has not changed. During his observations, Black said he pulled a student over on horseback because he had failed to observe a stop sign at Haigis Mall and then pulled out of the intersection, passing a crosswalk that had two pedestrians waiting on the side of the road.

Haphazard driving was coupled with multiple excuses. Many students said they run through stop signs and crosswalks with pedestrians in it because they were late for class. One professor lamented that his speeding was a result of his being late to a meeting. Black said these are not excuses when it comes to providing a safe campus for students.

UMass Sergeant Mark Jacques reminds all people who drive cars to remember that they too are pedestrians at some point during the day. He asks people to bear this in mind the next time they decide to get behind the wheel.

Senate majority leader Lott calls for resignation of Reno

By David A. Vise and Lorraine Adams
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – The Senate's top Republican called on Attorney General Janet Reno to resign yesterday, amid growing furor on Capitol Hill over recent disclosures regarding the FBI's April 1993 raid on the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas, that left about 75 people dead.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, (R-Miss.), became the highest ranking official to ask the attorney general to step down, saying her errors in handling the fiery standoff in Waco and other mistakes have left him doubting both her effectiveness and competence.

The majority leader's comments came as Reno worked on finalizing the details of an independent inquiry into the matter to be led by former Republican Sen. John Danforth of Missouri, an appointment Justice officials said she planned to announce at a press conference this morning.

Lott said Congress must also take a role in re-examining the Waco siege, and a flurry of new congressional probes, including investigations by the Senate Judiciary Committee and the House Government Reform Committee, are already beginning. While Lott said that Congress might need to "issue subpoenas in order to find out the truth," he suggested the broader question might be Reno's continuing ability to serve as attorney general.

"I think the attorney general is falling into a pattern of not showing competence or probity," Lott said Wednesday.

"It's based on the pattern now that has developed over 6 1/2 years and the events involving the appointment of independent counsels, her refusal to provide information or answer questions by the Congress, the problem with the Waco investigation," Lott said. "All of that leads me to conclude that the attorney general should resign."

While other congressional Republicans have called on Reno to resign, Lott's comments raised the political stakes considerably because of his seniority and his direct attack on Reno's fundamental ability to serve.

Senate Minority Leader Thomas A. Daschle, (D-S.D.), and other congressional Democrats were quick to defend Reno. "I think Janet Reno deserves commendation, not criticism...under no circumstances do I think the attorney general should resign," he said yesterday.

President Clinton has also strongly supported his attorney general, saying she is doing a good job under difficult circumstances and pursuing the right course by launching an independent inquiry into the deadly Waco siege. Rather than pointing a finger at Reno, the president said any Waco investigation needs to focus on the role of the FBI and its director, Louis J. Freeh.

Clinton's remarks were not surprising, given tensions that have existed between the White House and the FBI director prior to the new Waco revelations. The harsh GOP criticism of Reno, too, is but the latest in a series of Republican condemnations of the attorney general, which escalated after she declined to appoint an independent counsel to investigate campaign finance issues.

Asked recently whether she had any intention of resigning over Waco, the attorney general said it was important to gather all of the facts before making any decisions regarding consequences. Although Reno and other officials at Justice and the FBI maintained for years that no incendiary devices were used in the Waco raid, new evidence recently emerged from an FBI review showing that two potentially incendiary tear gas canisters were fired into the Davidian compound hours before the deadly blaze began.

How do you recognize a great athlete?

Danielle Henderson is an amazing softball player. In fact, she was voted the best collegiate woman softball player in the country. But it was also her performance in the classroom and community that prompted more than 900 NCAA-member schools to choose her to receive this year's Honda Award. On her behalf, American Honda is making a donation to the women's athletics program at your school. So if you happen to see Danielle Henderson, be sure to congratulate her. An athlete of her caliber is easy to recognize. Even when she's not carrying her gym bag.

Congratulations to Danielle Henderson, Softball

UMass visionary passes away

Oswald Tippo, the first chancellor to lead the flagship campus of the University of Massachusetts, died June 10 in Santa Barbara, Calif., at age 87.

Tippo shaped the University's image as a major national research institution by recruiting and hiring top-ranked faculty, and supporting construction of the W.E.B. DuBois Library and development of the library's collection.

In a prepared statement, University President William M. Bulger said Tippo "loved the University and recognized it for its greatness."

Tippo was appointed chancellor in 1970, after holding the position of provost for six years. His appointment marked the reorganization of the University of Massachusetts system. Chancellors were appointed to head the Amherst, Boston and Worcester campuses, while the University's president continued to direct the system's policy and operations.

Tippo is survived by his wife, the former Emmie Fernas; a son, Denis R. Tippo, of Avon, Conn.; three granddaughters and a grandson; and four step-grandchildren. A second son, Ray Ethan Tippo, died in 1998.

Avakian is also pushing for a new Student Union, rather than renovations to the old building. He also wants to look at how UMass handles reports of sexual assault and rape.

He also looked at the possibility of voluntary course and teacher evaluations being available online for the spring semester. UMass administration has offered to fund the website that would contain the evaluations, but according to Avakian, since that offer, the administration has been dragging their feet.

"We need administration saying this is a priority before it goes through," Avakian said.

Avakian also mentioned a resolution for notification of parents for alcohol violations that has been passed by the Trustees.

"This is a resolution that goes back to attitudes of the early 60's, and the issue of the university being a parental institution," Avakian said. "I think it's the wrong way to go.

"Someone could be shooting heroin, light their building on fire and be assaulting someone and no one's calling the kid's parents, but if they have alcohol, parents are going to be notified."

Orbillard and Avakian haven't been the only SGA members at work or with work to do.

Jared Brooslin, the SGA Secretary of Public Policy and Relations, is planning an informational semester for students.

"What I do is inform students of things that are going on with landlords, like changes in landlord tenant laws, issues of search and seizure in dorm rooms and making sure there isn't police abuse of students," Brooslin said.

This year, Brooslin is also working on the upcoming fall elections for the Student Senate, in addition to his responsibilities concerning student housing.

"I'm trying to get judiciaries involved so elections run smoothly and to ensure judicial members will be available to vote on the issues that might come up," Brooslin said.

On Sunday, September 12th the 51st annual Emmy's will air. Millions of people will tune in to see their favorite TV stars step up to the podium to receive a gilded statuette symbolizing all their hard work over the past season. However, most people don't know a lot about the history of the star studded ceremonies. For instance ..

DID YOU KNOW?

- The word Emmy is derived from the engineering term "Immy," referring to the orthicon tube that was used in the '50s to show a picture on a television set.
- The most nominations received by any individual in any field are 46 for Dwight Hemion. Who you may ask? The famous producer has headed many shows, including Barbara Streisand's latest HBO special. Interestingly enough, David Lettermen is second with 38.
- Ed Asner is the winningest performer of all time with seven Emmys.
- The most Emmys won by a performer in the same role on the same series is 5. Both Candice Bergen in "Murphy Brown" and Don Knotts in "The Andy Griffith Show" share this honor.
- The most nominations for any one show ever are 117 by Cheers. M*A*S*H with 100 and Hill Street Blues with 98 round out the top three.
- Among this year's nominees, ER has the

Every fall, we have television contests. This Sunday night, the 51st annual Emmy Awards will kick off in Los Angeles. It will certainly be an evening filled with excitement as TV creators battle head to head to take away the ultimate prize in home entertainment. Who will win? Who should win? Everything is up in the air.

Outstanding Drama Series

(Who Will Win) – "HBO runs a commercial with the phrase "nothing in life is a guarantee." The popular cable network has quite a knack for stuff like that, because it is an absolute certainty that "The Sopranos" will win one award. Although the series only ran for half of a season, "The Sopranos" rings for the most talked about show of the decade. Even shows like "Cheers and "Seinfeld" took time to gain viewers and respect, but "The Sopranos," which leads Emmy nominations with 16, had an instant impact on day one. Do I need to say more?

(Who Should Win) – I said anything other than "The Sopranos" I'd be crazy. I don't think there should be any doubt in my mind, or anyone else's, that this HBO instant classic is clearly deserving of the award.

Outstanding Mini Series

(What Will Win) – Joan of Arc

(What Should Win) – The 60's

Outstanding Lead Actor in a Drama Series

(Who Will Win) – Since it is definitely the year of "The Sopranos," James Gandolfini will walk away with this award. His role as Tony Soprano is the central figure in the show's success.

(Who Should Win) – Dennis Franz would be my choice for this award. In the show's long tenure, he has been the constant. I definitely do not agree with the academy's failure to nominate Jimmy Smits, simply because his character was killed off. However, Franz has been able to carry the show on his back, and should be commended for it.

Outstanding Supporting Actor in a Drama Series

(Who Will Win) – Benjamin Bratt for "Law and Order"

(Who Should Win) – Michael Badalucco for "The Practice"

Outstanding Lead Actress in a Drama Series

(Who Will Win) – "The Sopranos" will keep on hitting when Edie Falco walks away with this award. Falco plays Carmela, the wife of Tony Soprano, and this will be her first Emmy award.

(Who Should Win) – Edie Falco deserves the award that he'll get. Although Gandolfini is the glue that holds the show together, Falco is right there for the support.

Outstanding Supporting Actress in a Drama Series

(Who Will Win) – Nancy Marchand for "The Sopranos"

(Who Should Win) – Nancy Marchand for "The Sopranos"

Outstanding Lead Actor in a Comedy Series

(Who Will Win) – Don't let Ray Romano fool you! He seems to be the underdog in a category filled with big names, but the academy loves him, and he's winning this award.

Crime Doesn't Pay (Usually)

The two best dramas on television often feature stabbings, shootings, drug deals conspiracies, and various other acts of a criminal nature. And those examples only scratch the surface of the haunting illegal activity that occurs throughout each episode of "The Sopranos" and "OZ," two brilliant series on HBO.

And while this mischief lands its deviants either whacked (Sopranos) or in the hole (OZ), it resulted in a tremendous 16 Emmy nominations for the mob drama, and a criminal 2 nominations for the prison series. Although "The Sopranos" deserves every one of its nominations, "Oz" should have received the same treatment.

"The Sopranos" ran its first twelve episodes between January and April of this year, to much critical praise and

Tori & Alanis Together

Mismatched Pair perform poorly

ALANIS MORRISETTE/TORI AMOS

MANSFIELD - The cliché "unholy alliance" comes to mind. No one who is a fan of either performer could have imagined them going on tour together, and it is still unclear in the minds of many just whose idea this endeavor was. But nonetheless, there was a large crowd of people at the former Great Woods to see Alanis Morrisette and Tori Amos, but very few were there to see both.

First, let's comment on the "Tweeter Center." All of the large concert venues in the Boston area have shed their once prestigious titles to adopt the name of a corporation that might survive through the next decade. With these hostile takeovers, prices go up, services go down, and Ticketmaster rears it ugly head. Security loves to display their testosterone, and the ushers can't help you other than to say, "moo." Mp3.com and Best Buy were the corporate sponsors of this tour, making their shameless promotional tents standing in your way to the restroom. Add all that to prices so high you'd think the beer was spiked with Ecstasy and idiots who can't seem to find their seats, and you have the formula for one unpleasant experience.

So brings us to the "Five and a Half Weeks" tour. Just by looking at some of the audience members, one could tell who was there to see Alanis, and who was there to see Tori.

Tori took stage first, opening with "God." Now, there are some who firmly believe that Ms. Amos can do no wrong, but the reality is that Tori has made quite a few mistakes in her career (Y Kant Tori Read, her forsaken first album, springs to mind) and this tour is one of them. In all, Tori put on a good performance, but she was not quite at the top of her form. "Sugar," the second song in her set, stood out among the others. But the high energy exerted early in her set quickly calmed down. The three piece band carted along on the "Plugged '98" tour were present, making fans long for the piano/harpsichord setup that predated From the Choirgirl Hotel. Three songs from her forthcoming double LP, To Venus and Back were performed, including the single "Thank U," and a few cuts from her 1995 hit album, Jagged Little Pill, such as "You Learn."

So what did we learn from this experiment? Sadly it points toward a trend in double bills/festival tours. Book artists with entirely different fan bases. There must be at least one artist that you'll pay to see. Study the demographics. Look at the lineup for the upcoming Family Values tour, and ask why a band like Limp Bizkit is on the same bill with a band like The Crystal Method. Maybe artists want to bring their music to people that haven't been exposed to it before. Let's hope that was Tori and Alanis' motive all along, because the "out of mutual respect and admiration" explanation posted on the tour's website is asking us to suspend a bit too much disbelief.

Alanis spent most of her set stumbling back and forth across the Tweeter stage, spewing lyrics filled with 69-cent vocabulary words that most of her fans cannot define. Pushing her album Supposed Former Infatuation Junkie, Alanis played the required single "Thank U," and a few cuts from her 1995 hit album, Jagged Little Pill, such as "You Learn."

media coverage. This no doubt was a factor in the number of nominations it received, but it is an incredible series truly deserving of all the praise. The nomination for Outstanding Art Direction is surely merited as the series some of the best camera work and cinematography in a television show, ever. Tony Soprano's (James Gandolfini) business dealings take him to a variety of locales in the New Jersey area, and they are always shot with intelligence and style.

Gandolfini himself is nominated for Outstanding Lead Actor in a Drama Series, and it's impossible to find a better-rounded character on television today. Every possible emotion is squeezed out of Tony throughout this first season as he deals with issues such as betrayal, rage and depression. Gandolfini conveys all of these feelings with incredible talent.

His co-workers such as Edie Falco (as Tony's wife Carmela), Lorraine Bracco (as Tony's psychiatrist) and Nancy Marchand (as Tony's elderly and very dangerous mother) give equally riveting performances.

All three women are up for acting awards. Edie Falco is also on the cast of "OZ" and her smaller role in the third season of that show can most likely be attributed to her much larger and more interesting role as Carmela, the Mafia wife who has conflicting interests between her luxurious lifestyle and the means by which she obtains it. Nancy Marchand is excellent as Livia, Tony's mother. Her constant complaining earlier in the season is often hilarious, but her performance transforms into one of complete malice as she is revealed to be the one who is really calling the shots in the Soprano family. The series is also up for Outstanding Writing in a Drama Series nomination, this time for four different episodes. The writing on "The Sopranos" is hands down the best drama writing on television today. Nothing else comes close. The depth of the characters and plot twists found in one episode of the series easily surpasses some of this summer full-length movies.

Finally, if you haven't guessed by now, I think that "The Sopranos" should easily win Outstanding Drama Series, and if it doesn't, I will never watch The Emmys again, even though I never have.

"Oz" just wrapped up its third season over the summer, but the two Emmy nominations are for the second season. One is for a guest actor, whose name I can't identify among the many guest stars of each season. The other is for Outstanding Casting, an award richly deserved by the series. The second season seems ancient to me now, since it is about 15 months old, but all three seasons of the drama were equally outstanding, so I won't distinguish between them.

The acting is consistently top-notch from all of the regular cast members; including J.K. Simmons as the cold-blooded Nazi Vern Shillinger, Eamonn Walder as the Muslim leader Kareem Said and Adewale Akinnuoye-Agbaje as the "on again - off again" reigning bad-ass Simon Adebisi. These three, along with Dean Winters, Lee Tergesen and Harold Perrineau have the most consistently major roles, and all deserve acting awards.

But it is hard to give praise to just individual actors since "Oz" has the largest cast of fully developed characters in any television show I have ever seen. At one time, there could be six to eight story lines taking place, involving upwards of twenty characters, all of whom are knows to the audience and not one timers (There are plenty of them too, since most prisoners don't survive that long in OZ).

Prisoner Augustus Hill (Perrineau) narrates the show, and his little scene introductions range from humorous historical references to thought provoking philosophies on the mortality of prisoners. The writing is just as brilliant as "The Sopranos," and has this way been for twice the number of hour-long episodes. All aspects of the prisoners' lives are examined throughout the series, from why they are in prison, their survival skills inside, and their family ties that made them criminals in the first place.

The show's violence is often disturbing, and definitely aims to shock, but in doing so, offers a realistic solidified spot as one of the greatest television dramas ever. It should with the Outstanding Casting Emmy, and it should have been nominated for a hell of a lot more, especially for the superb writing.

Although I recommend skipping the lackluster, over-indulgent ceremonies and reading about the winners in the newspapers, if you do subject yourself to the patience-testing Emmys, at least you'll probably see some talented and deserving people pick up some awards for these two excellent shows.

Teaching Mrs. Tingle

Teaching Mrs. Tingle
Directed by Kevin Williamson
with Helen Mirren, Katie Holmes, Marisa Coughlin, Barry Watson

Kevin Williamson, the man who brought us Scream, Scream 2, I Know What You Did Last Summer, The Faculty and the popular television series "Dawson's Creek" has unleashed his newest addition to teenage culture, an unlikely movie about three high schoolers and one hellish teacher.

Teaching Mrs. Tingle (previously called Killing Mrs. Tingle before recent school shootings demanded a change for the sake of good taste) breaks the mold of Williamson's earlier movies, abandoning his commercially successful horror flick formula for a murkier story of high school students who aim to settle a score with the one person to whom high schoolers are forever subjugated: their teacher.

Specifically, they target Mrs. Tingle (Helen Mirren, giving what is by far the best performance of the movie), a merciless history teacher who displays no compassion toward even her most hard-working and devoted students. One such student is Leigh Anne Watson (played by "Dawson's Creek" head-turner Katie Holmes), whose plans for college depend upon her making valedictorian and collecting a hefty scholarship. For this to happen, however, she needs to receive an "A" on her final project in Mrs. Tingle's history class. When she gets unjustly accused of cheating, she visits Mrs. Tingle at her house to try and explain.

Accompanying her are best friend and aspiring actor Jolynn Jordan (Marisa Coughlin) and "too-cool-for-school-work" outsider Luke Charner (Barry Watson). Mrs. Tingle won't listen to the students' arguments, and as they try to force her to see reason, things quickly get out of hand: Luke shoots Mrs. Tingle in a head with a crossbow and knocks her unconscious, and they decide to tie her to her bed until she sees things their way.

This implausible turn of events would need a solid script and a believable cast of characters to pull itself above sheer lunacy, and unfortunately neither of these is available. The students' motivation is purely selfish and their attack is impossible to forgive. "Contrived" doesn't begin to describe this movie's premise. "Laughable" is much closer to the mark.

The characters are equally disappointing: Williamson pulls these characters out of the same bag of two-dimensional walking stereotypes he uses for all of his movies. The three students are painted so shallowly that sympathy for them is nearly impossible.

Everything about them, from Leigh Anne's lane-shift working single mom to Luke's slacker-with-a-brain attitude comes across as 100 percent recycled material. Williamson attempts to create a back-story for his characters, but even that feels tacked-on and arbitrary, simply an excuse for the (couldn't see this com-

Guster is at Pearl Street, while Erelli takes the venerable Iron Horse stage. If one show sells out purchase tickets for the other, as both are sure to please. The Collegian will preview both shows in special features in tomorrow's edition.

On Saturday, make sure you wear your maroon and white because the defending national champion football team plays New Hampshire at McGuirk Stadium with kickoff set for 1pm. Or you could head to the Charlemont Fairgrounds for Reggae Fest '99, which runs all day. That night considering seeing the witty and somewhat demented Mission Improvable in the Campus Center.

The rest of the week, Chris Cornell has a sold-out show at the Sanders Theatre in Boston, the Chemical Brothers come to Avalon and on Wednesday, Tricky sees action at Pearl Street in Northampton while WBCN Rumble award winners, the Shelia Divine, play at TT the Bears in Boston.

This is the debut of the calendar section in the Daily Collegian and we hope you enjoyed it. Now it is up to you, our reader, to improve it. Let us know what worked, what didn't, what you would like to see, and anything else that you feel would make this section more effective. Email your comments to eventcalendar @excite.com. Hope you enjoy the first weekend of the fall semester!

Tori & Alanis Together
Mismatched Pair perform poorly

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

ALANIS MORRISETTE/TORI AMOS

MANSFIELD – The cliché "unholy alliance" comes to mind. No one who is a fan of either performer could have imagined them going on tour together, and it is still unclear in the minds of many just whose idea this endeavor was. But nonetheless, there was a large crowd of people at the former Great Woods to see Alanis Morrisette and Tori Amos, but very few were there to see both.

First, let's comment on the "Tweeter Center." All of the large concert venues in the Boston area have shed their once prestigious titles to adopt the name of a corporation that might survive through the next decade. With these hostile takeovers, prices go up, services go down, and Ticketmaster rears it ugly head. Security loves to display their testosterone, and the ushers can't help you other than to say, "moo." Mp3.com and Best Buy were the corporate sponsors of this tour, making their shameless promotional tents standing in your way to the restroom. Add all that to prices so high you'd think the beer was spiked with Ecstasy and idiots who can't seem to find their seats, and you have the formula for one unpleasant experience.

So brings us to the "Five and a Half Weeks" tour. Just by looking at some of the audience members, one could tell who was there to see Alanis, and who was there to see Tori.

Tori took stage first, opening with "God." Now, there are some who firmly believe that Ms. Amos can do no wrong, but the reality is that Tori has made quite a few mistakes in her career (I Kant Tori Read, her forsaken first album, springs to mind) and this tour is one of them. In all, Tori put on a good performance, but she was not quite at the top of her form. "Sugar," the second song in her set, stood out among the others. But the high energy exerted early in her set quickly calmed down. The three piece band carted along on the "Plugged '98" tour were present, making lans long for the piano/harpsichord setup that predated From the Choirgirl Hotel. Three songs from her forthcoming double LP, To Venus and Back were performed, including the single "Bliss." The highlight of the set was the quiet beauty of "Winter," although it was interrupted early into the song, so Tori could tell an obnoxious audience member to, "Eat my pussy." Whether or not this ruined the song, the sheer unexpectedness of the moment made for an amusing story. "Cornflake Girl" and "Cruel" were also performed. Her set lasted barely an hour, with "Precious Things" being the one song encore.

Alanis took stage some 20 minutes later to a significantly less crowded auditorium (the "No readmittance" policy did not seem to phase some). Opening with "Hand In My Pocket," Morissette displayed all the style and grace of a drunken vagrant. "All I Really Want" was performed next. Alanis spent most of her set stumbling back and forth across the Tweeter stage, spewing lyrics filled with 69-cent vocabulary words that most of her fans cannot define. Pushing her album Supposed Former Infatuation Junkie, Alanis played the required single "Thank U," and a few cuts from her 1995 hit album, Jagged Little Pill, such as "You Learn."

So what did we learn from this experiment? Sadly it points toward a trend in double bills/festival tours. Book artists with entirely different fan bases. There must be at least one artist that you'll pay to see. Study the demographics. Look at the lineup for the upcoming Family Values tour, and ask why a band like Limp Bizkit is on the same bill with a band like The Crystal Method. Maybe artists want to bring their music to people that haven't been exposed to it before. Let's hope that was Tori and Alanis' motive all along, because the "out of mutual respect and admiration" explanation posted on the tour's website is asking us to suspend a bit too much disbelief.

media coverage. This no doubt was a factor in the number of nominations it received, but it is an incredible series truly deserving of all the praise. The nomination for Outstanding Art Direction is surely merited as the series some of the best camera work and cinematography in a television show, ever. Tony Soprano's (James Gandolfini) business dealings take him to a variety of locales in the New Jersey area, and they are always shot with intelligence and style.

Gandolfini himself is nominated for Outstanding Lead Actor in a Drama Series, and it's impossible to find a better-rounded character on television today. Every possible emotion is squeezed out of Tony throughout this first season as he deals with issues such as betrayal, rage and depression. Gandolfini conveys all of these feelings with incredible talent.

His co-workers such as Edie Falco (as Tony's wife Carmela), Lorraine Bracco (as Tony's psychiatrist) and Nancy Marchand (as Tony's elderly and very dangerous mother) give equally riveting performances.

All three women are up for acting awards. Edie Falco is also on the cast of "OZ" and her smaller role in the third season of that show can most likely be attributed to her much larger and more interesting role as Carmela, the Mafia wife who has conflicting interests between her luxurious lifestyle and the means by which she obtains it. Nancy Marchand is excellent as Livia, Tony's mother. Her constant complaining earlier in the season is often hilarious, but her performance transforms into one of complete malice as she is revealed to be the one who is really calling the shots in the Soprano family. The series is also up for Outstanding Writing in a Drama Series nomination, this time for four different episodes. The writing on "The Sopranos" is hands down the best drama writing on television today. Nothing else comes close. The depth of the characters and plot twists found in one episode of the series easily surpasses some of this summer full-length movies.

Finally, if you haven't guessed by now, I think that "The Sopranos" should easily win Outstanding Drama Series, and if it doesn't, I will never watch The Emmys again, even though I never have.

"Oz" just wrapped up its third season over the summer, but the two Emmy nominations are for the second season. One is for a guest actor, whose name I can't identify among the many guest stars of each season. The other is for Outstanding Casting, an award richly deserved by the series. The second season seems ancient to me now, since it is about 15 months old, but all three seasons of the drama were equally outstanding, so I won't distinguish between them.

The acting is consistently top-notch from all of the regular cast members; including J.K. Simmons as the cold-blooded Nazi Vern Shillinger, Eamonn Walder as the Muslim leader Kareem Said and Adewale Akinnuoye-Agbaje as the "on again - off again" reigning bad-ass Simon Adebisi. These three, along with Dean Winters, Lee Tergesen and Harold Perrineau have the most consistently major roles, and all deserve acting awards.

But it is hard to give praise to just individual actors since "Oz" has the largest cast of fully developed characters in any television show I have ever seen. At one time, there could be six to eight story lines taking place, involving upwards of twenty characters, all of whom are knows to the audience and not one timers (There are plenty of them too, since most prisoners don't survive that long in OZ).

Prisoner Augustus Hill (Perrineau) narrates the show, and his little scene introductions range from humorous historical references to thought provoking philosophies on the morality of prisoners. The writing is just as brilliant as "The Sopranos," and has this way been for twice the number of hour-long episodes. All aspects of the prisoners' lives are examined throughout the series, from why they are in prison, their survival skills inside, and their family ties that made them criminals in the first place.

The show's violence is often disturbing, and definitely aims to shock, but in doing so, offers a realistic solidified spot as one of the greatest television dramas ever. It should with the Outstanding Casting Emmy, and it should have been nominated for a hell of a lot more, especially for the superb writing.

Although I recommend skipping the lackluster, over-indulgent ceremonies and reading about the winners in the newspapers, if you do subject yourself to the patience-testing Emmys, at least you'll probably see some talented and deserving people pick up some awards for these two excellent shows.

ANNA FELDER

Tori tours as part of an oddly paired tour.

Teaching Mrs. Tingle

Teaching Mrs. Tingle
Directed by Kevin Williamson
with Helen Mirren, Katie Holmes, Marisa Coughlin, Barry Watson

Kevin Williamson, the man who brought us Scream, Scream 2, I Know What You Did Last Summer, The Faculty and the popular television series "Dawson's Creek" has unleashed his newest addition to teenage culture, an unlikely movie about three high schoolers and one hellish teacher.

Teaching Mrs. Tingle (previously called Killing Mrs. Tingle before recent school shootings demanded a change for the sake of good taste) breaks the mold of Williamson's earlier movies, abandoning his commercially successful horror flick formula for a murkier story of high school students who aim to settle a score with the one person to whom high schoolers are forever subjugated: their teacher.

Specifically, they target Mrs. Tingle (Helen Mirren, giving what is by far the best performance of the movie), a merciless history teacher who displays no compassion toward even her most hard-working and devoted students. One such student is Leigh Anne Watson (played by "Dawson's Creek" head-turner Katie Holmes), whose plans for college depend upon her making valedictorian and collecting a hefty scholarship. For this to happen, however, she needs to receive an "A" on her final project in Mrs. Tingle's history class. When she gets unjustly accused of cheating, she visits Mrs. Tingle at her house to try and explain.

Accompanying her are best friend and aspiring actor Jolynn Jordan (Marisa Coughlin) and "too-cool-for-schoolwork" outsider Luke Charner (Barry Watson). Mrs. Tingle won't listen to the students' arguments, and as they try to force her to see reason, things quickly get out of hand; Luke shoots Mrs. Tingle in a head with a crossbow and knocks her unconscious, and they decide to tie her to her bed until she sees things their way.

This implausible turn of events would need a solid script and a believable cast of characters to pull itself above sheer lunacy, and unfortunately neither of these is available. The students' motivation is purely selfish and their attack is impossible to forgive. "Contrived" doesn't begin to describe this movie's premise. "Laughable" is much closer to the mark.

The characters are equally disappointing; Williamson pulls these characters out of the same bag of two-dimensional walking stereotypes he uses for all of his movies. The three students are painted so shallowly that sympathy for them is nearly impossible.

Everything about them, from Leigh Anne's fate-shift working single mom to Luke's slacker-with-a-brain attitude comes across as 100 percent recycled material. Williamson attempts to create a back-story for his characters, but even that feels tacked-on and arbitrary, simply an excuse for the (couldn't see this coming).

"Name the calendar" contest! Win free tickets!

Forget about the dining commons and head on over to Metawampee Lawn where food, music, and hot-air balloon rides await you. If you are of legal age, don't miss valley great, John Sheldon, at the ABC tonight. John began playing with Van Morrison at the young age of seventeen and has performed everywhere from coffeehouses to stadiums across the world. Otherwise explore the on-campus and downtown social environment, because come Friday it is all about the music.

Guster and Mark Erelli come to Northampton for their respective shows on Friday, performing at the same time and only a street apart. Guster, hot off their appearances at Woodstock and the WFNX Hatchshell are prepared to break especially with their amazing late August release, Lost and Gone Forever. Erelli, on the other hand is a dazzling performer and the pioneer of the next generation of folk. He has been receiving wide spread acclaim from throughout the music industry. Guster is at Pearl Street, while Erelli takes the venerable Iron Horse stage. If one show sells out purchase tickets for the other, as both are sure to please. The Collegian will preview both shows in special features in tomorrow's edition.

On Saturday, make sure you wear your maroon and white because the defending national champion football team plays New Hampshire at McGuirk Stadium with kickoff set for 1pm. Or you could head to the Charlemont Fairgrounds for Reggae Fest '99, which runs all day. That night considering seeing the witty and somewhat demented Mission Improvable in the Campus Center.

The rest of the week, Chris Cornell has a sold-out show at the Sanders Theatre in Boston, the Chemical Brothers come to Avalon and on Wednesday, Tricky sees action at Pearl Street in Northampton while WBCN Rumble award winners, the Shelia Divine, play at TT the Bears in Boston.

This is the debut of the calendar section in the Daily Collegian and we hope you enjoyed it. Now it is up to you, our reader, to improve it. Let us know what worked, what didn't, what you would like to see, and anything else that you feel would make this section more effective. Email your comments to eventcalendar @excite.com. Hope you enjoy the first weekend of the fall semester!

Free tix info!

This here calendar section is missing a name. We Collegian folks could only think of pretty generic no-brainer names, like the "Campus Calendar," so we are asking you for help! Just send us an email to eventcal-endar@excite.com by 5pm next Monday with your suggestion for what the name should be; we'll sort through all the entries and the winner will pick up a pair of tickets to any event in the next year at the pretty hip Skybox. The Skybox is a club located on the top floor of the Campus Center that is opening in mid-October. With a capacity of roughly 500, it is the second largest live music club in the western part of the state. It aims to have forty-plus events in their inaugural year ranging from bringing some of the hottest bands in the country to producing a number of amazing dance nights. So drop us a line and you could be the first on campus to win a pair of passes to a Skybox event of your choice!

Changes Noted

This is a great time to be at this university. The social scene at UMass is getting a huge boost this October with a number of local and national bands coming to UMass and the Pioneer Valley. The Daily Collegian Arts & Living Section feels obligated to join in this revitalization of social well being with a series of radical changes.

The most significant modification is the addition of a calendar section to Thursday's edition. This section will provide a weekly listing of live music performances, dance clubs, movie listings, performing arts, comedy, upcoming regional concerts, along with many other events. Support for Five-College and emerging talent will also be revitalized.

The paper will also take a forward focus by reporting on events before they happen. Previews will become standard for all major events occurring throughout New England and in-depth focuses on artists with quotes, pictures, and album critiques will replace the rarely read and generally uninformative CD reviews.

As your student newspaper we continuously strive towards providing information that will fill your needs. If you have any suggestions on changes that you would like to see us implement or would like to be a part of our exciting writing staff please feel free to stop by the Daily Collegian office in the basement of the Campus Center, or call me directly at 545-1361.

Thank you,
Tom Sadlowski
Music Editor

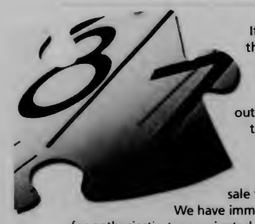
most previous nominations with 84.



- Hill Street Blues and L.A. Law are tied for the most Emmy wins as Best Drama Series with four.
- Cheers, The Dick Van Dyke Show, and All in the Family share the top spot for wins as Best Comedy Series, also with four.
- The Mary Tyler Moore Show holds the overall record for Emmy's won by a series with 29. (Cheers – 28, Hill Street Blues – 26)
- Among this year's nominees, Frasier has the most wins with 20.
- The most Emmys won by any series in one season is 8 by ER and Hill Street Blues. Ironically, both won them in their first season, also a record.
- "Pirates of Silicon Valley," nominated for Outstanding Made-for-TV Movie and four other Emmys was actually aired on TNT, unannounced in late May because the film's June premier date was past the Emmy cutoff.
- That the 70th Annual Academy Awards Ceremony won the most Emmys last year with 5. Talk about Hollywood congratulating itself.
- Emmy nominees Trinity, Buddy Faro, and Fantasy Island were all canceled before they aired for one-full season, proving once and for all, they have no clue what we like

(Who Will Win) – Michael J. Fox is always excellent in "Spin City." Every year I say he should win this, and he finally did last year. He deserves the award again.
Outstanding Supporting Actor in a Comedy Series
(Who Will Win) – David Hyde Pierce for "Frasier"
(Who Should Win) – David Spade for "Just Shoot Me"
Outstanding Lead Actress in a comedy series
(Who Will Win) – Jenna Elfman is hosting the Awards show, along with David Hyde Pierce. I have a feeling that as homage to that, she will undeservingly win this award. "Dharma and Greg" is over-rated and unfunny. However, get ready to hear an acceptance speech from Jenna Elfman.
(Who Should Win) – One show that is overshadowed by "The Sopranos," is "Sex in the City." Since so many people are paying attention to "The Sopranos," people are forgetting that HBO has another gem in this comedy series that stars Sarah Jessica Parker. She should win this award. "Sex in the City" is excellent.
Outstanding Supporting Actress in a Comedy Series
(Who Will Win) – Lisa Kudrow for "Friends"
(Who Should Win) – Lisa Kudrow for "Friends"
Outstanding Made for TV Movie
(What Will Win) – The Rat Pack
(What Should Win) – The Rat Pack
Outstanding Variety, Music, or Comedy Series
(What Will Win) – Last year, the creative "Politically Incorrect with Bill Mahr" won this award. It will seemingly win it again.
(What Should Win) – "Dennis Miller Live" is the funniest series of the decade, and it gets the least amount of credit. It is the best show on HBO, despite what anyone else says, and even though it never does, it should win this award year in and year out.
Outstanding Variety, Music, or Comedy Special
(What Will Win) – 71st Annual Academy Awards
(What Should Win) – John Leguizamo's: Freak
Outstanding Comedy Series
(What Will Win) – "Everybody Loves Raymond" is the newcomer, and perhaps the most under watched show nominated in this category. I have this feeling that the academy will honor this. However it seems stupid to bet against "Frasier", since it has won the award for the last five years. Every year a new show comes in to challenge "Frasier," and every year the new show loses. "Frasier" has won more than "Seinfeld," "Ally Mcbeal" and "Friends" combined, and one more is very possible. At this point, it seems to be a dead heat between "Frasier" and "Everybody Loves Raymond." One of these two shows will win the award.
(What Should Win) – The best show on television last year was not "The Sopranos." It was "Friends." "Friends was absolutely perfect, and would be thrilled to see it with this award.

Megadeth returns with new disk

Risk a disappointing blend of thrash/mainstream

Michael Delano
Collegian Correspondent

Megadeth titles their ninth and most recent album "Risk," and fans expecting the band to take a lot of risks will be both pleased and disappointed. Lead singer and guitarist Dave Mustaine claims the album title is in response to former bandmate Lars Ulrich's comment that Megadeth is talented, but they take too few risks. Ulrich's band Metallica has taken some risks in the past decade, trading in their trademark metal roots in favor of mainstream radio play and round-the-clock MTV coverage, which they unfortunately, have succeeded in achieving. Megadeth, contrary to Ulrich, have taken many of the same risks as Metallica, like evolving out of thrash metal and exploring new aspects of heavy music. However, Megadeth has aged much better, maintaining their integrity while making good music beyond their first four albums.

Megadeth's two members that have appeared on every album are Mustaine and bassist Dave Ellefson. The two of them started Megadeth in the early 80's, and released the debut album Killing is My Business...and Business is Good! in 1985, and the album remains an under appreciated thrash classic.

Two more thrash albums in the 80's followed: Peace Sells...But Who's Buying? and So Far, So Good, So What? Unfortunately, although they had their moments, they were inconsistent and didn't show much progress. The conclusion of Megadeth's thrash days came with 1990's Rust in Peace, a masterpiece that earns its place alongside Metallica's Kill 'Em All and Slayer's Reign In Blood as one of the finest thrash albums ever made.

A warning to all thrash fans, Risk contains NO thrash songs. Yep, break out the Exodus, since while the last release, Cryptic Writings, featured a few tracks that recalled the days of Megadeth's former self, Risk has no such moments. This doesn't mean it's not enjoyable, but it forces metal fans to determine just how much change they want to deal with.

"Insomnia," the opening track, is the album's heaviest, and has an excellent beginning, with some odd guitar noises giving way to a violin which segues into the awesome riff. It's a great track, and the futuristic sound is definitely a departure from the norm. "Prince of Darkness" lyrically sounds like something that would come off of Peace Sells..., but is much slower than anything off that album.

The first single off the album is "Crush 'Em," and is the type of adrenaline pumping song that by now, Megadeth could write in their sleep. It's about as thought provoking as a punch in the face, but it's fun to listen to even if there were definitely no risks involved in making its way onto the album.

The rest of the album is good, if uneventful. "Wanderlust" and "Breadline" are both enjoyable songs with a "heavy classic rock" feel, despite their less-than-inspired lyrics about being down on your luck and the love of wandering. "Seven" and "Time: The End," are both great tracks with some truly great guitar work, which is to be expected from the incredible Marty Friedman.

Where the album really falters is with "The Doctor Is Calling" and "I'll Be There." "Doctor" comes right in the middle of the album, and has a moody, atmospheric quality to it, which is good, except that it never goes anywhere. The song never takes off, making it feel like an intermission between the halves of the album instead of a track enjoyable on its own. And the second half of the album kicks off with a major dud, as writing the song "I'll Be There" is one of the risks Megadeth shouldn't have taken. The song incomprehensibly starts with a five second blast of grind-core guitar, which leads not so smoothly into the cheesy sounding riff. From then on we're treated to a cheesy chorus and even the "oh wah oh" chant in the background that is reminiscent of oh so many crappy eighties power ballads.

So in the end, the problem with "Risk" is that Megadeth didn't really follow through with any of the risks they take. An album full of the electronic beat of "Insomnia" would be interesting, but an album in the key of "I'll Be There" would cause me throw myself from my seventh floor balcony. Megadeth didn't risk much; therefore they don't get much in return.

ing!) love triangle of jealousy and resentment. Mrs. Tingle herself is portrayed as much too evil ever to be realistic; she's a parody of an actual nasty teacher, and nothing about her lets you take her seriously.

The acting in Teaching Mrs. Tingle is probably its strongest area. Katie Holmes is her usual sweet self, basically fitting her role from Dawson's Creek. Marisa Coughlin gives a spirited, if completely typical, performance as an extroverted high school dramatist. Helen Mirren as Mrs. Tingle can be delicious wicked, but her performance is wasted on her character's incomplete lack of credibility. Barry Watson is entirely forgettable as the flat and useless Luke.

Teaching Mrs. Tingle has its moments, but the movie doesn't seem to know whether it's a horror movie or a movie about character growth and reconciliation. As a horror movie it fails utterly, offering no scares and a paper-thin conflict. As a character story, it never manages to overcome its shallow characters and absurd plot.

Flesh-raiser fake, mum-keeping an eye on Mrs. Tingle, and as they talk with the bound teacher there are some momentary glimpses into the depths of their characters, hints of interest that a stronger script would have explored more fully. Mrs. Tingle begins to reveal bits of her past that parallel the students'. Loosing her husband Richard to another woman reminds her of the students' romantic entanglements, and she relates to Leigh-Anne's struggle to graduate at the top of her class and leave their town far behind her.

Just as this second layer begins to shine weakly through, however, Williamson destroys his progress by changing gears and stumbling his way through another Scream-esque violent ending. The finale of Teaching Mrs. Tingle redefines the word "pointless". Any distance he had made in exploring the psyche of Mrs. Tingle and her students is ruined in an almighty conflagration of cheesiness and one of the worst attempts at irony I've ever seen in a movie. Teaching Mrs. Tingle offers its audience nothing but a disorganized stew of tissue paper characters and half-assed story.

What kept us busy during the summer

It sure is nice to be back! After a summer filled with fun and excitement, (and by fun and excitement I mean sitting in front of a television) I'm ready to get back to school-not that will be jam packed with fun and excitement!

Over the past few months, I have done some extensive couch potato-ing, which I consider to be my major lifetime achievement. Okay, so maybe I'm over exaggerating a little bit, but the truth is that I love television. For the past two years, I have made it my personal goal to lend information and critique to everyone on this campus about what you should expect when you hit the "power" button on your remote control.

I had like I've been at a loss during the summer because every time I'd sit down to watch TV, I wasn't able to share with you my opinions or ideas about what I was witnessing. Since we're all back, I figure now is as good of a time as any to go over what happened this summer. So as David Letterman says, "I hold in my hand a night's top ten list. The topic: Top Ten TV Moments of the Summer of 1999."

10.) The 1999 MLB All Star Game. If you lived in New England, the only thing you heard about between July 10th and July 15th is the All Star Game at Fenway Park. The media-hype was incredible and the turnout was record setting for the game. It's still a wonder of what was more incredible, the game itself (in which Red Sox pitcher Pedro Martinez won the MVP award) or the coverage. No matter what it will be remember for a long time.

9.) WWF "Smackdown" Debuts on UPN - For more than a decade, NBC has dominated Thursday night television. Whenever a different network is setting up their line-up, they refer to Thursday nights (which have historically challenged shows such as "The Cosby Show," "Cheers," "Friends," "Seinfeld," and "ER") as the death slot. It really is where shows go to die, simply because they have no chance at taking ratings away from NBC. In late august, UPN did something daring. They bought the rights to show WWF wrestling, which get phenomenal cable ratings, on network TV, and may have the first ever, serious challenge to NBC's Thursday night line-up. It will be interesting to see how it pans out.

8.) "The Sopranos" Re-runs the Best Rookie Season Ever - The show nominated for 16 Emmy awards dazzled critics over the year, and used the summer to re-run all of the episodes from its awesome rookie season.

7.) Bruce Springsteen Kicks off his US Tour on VH1 - VH1 aired the first half hour of The Boss' first concert in the US. Unfortunately, North Attleboro Cable Sucks, and I didn't get to see it, since I don't have VH1. Luckily I was able to see him live at the Fleet Center.

6.) "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" - The most talked about show of the summer, was the crazy series, "Who Wants to be a Millionaire " Hosted by Regis Philbrman, the game show offered contestants multiple choice questions, which if they answered correctly, they could move up a level, and win more money. The most money they could possibly win would be one million dollars. The stupid plot of the show, and the even stupid er people that played dazzled millions of viewers, and the show piloted to the top of the ratings chart. I guess that means we'll be seeing more of "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" Well actually, let me rephrase that. I know that I won't be seeing any more of "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?" but if you want to watch, be my guest, just don't call me to help you answer the questions, because I do not know such useful facts as where Cameron Diaz went to college.

5.) Chris Carter Announces the End of "The X-Files" - Believe all you want, it's gone! After 26 more episodes "X-Files" creator, Chris Carter said that the widely popular sci-fi series would take its final bow. However, if I were a betting man, I'd say that the series would end with a cliffhanger to another movie.

4.) Barry Sanders Announces His Retirement - The greatest running back ever to play the game, will never be able to play in the most watched television spectacle of the year. Barry Sanders cited constant losing, and aging as reasons for leaving the NFL. It's too bad, because I think we'd all root for him if he were fighting for that Super Bowl ring.

3.) Viacom Merges With CBS - Viacom owns every possible portion of the media there is, except for CBS, so now they have CBS. Hey, maybe we'll be lucky and Tom Greene (Viacom owns MTV) will take over for David Letterman. No wait, that wouldn't be luck, that'd be torture.

2.) Chris Rock: Bigger and Blacker - If you asked me, "What is the funniest thing ever on television?" My response would be "Chris Rock: Bring the Pain." TV Guide also agrees with me, because when they released their top 50 funniest moments ever on TV, "Bring the Pain" was in the top ten. This summer, Rock returned with "Bigger and Blacker." The new stand-up comedy special was out-right hilarious, and almost as good as the first one. After months of anticipation, Rock delivered exactly what I though he would, and it was by far the best hour of summer entertainment. I'll watch Chris Rock over any movie that came out this summer, any day of the week!

1.) The Tragic Crash of JFK Jr.'s Plane - Three people died, in an even that was a media field day. Living in Massachusetts my whole life, made this event all the more difficult to comprehend. After all of the hype surrounding it, the fact is that it's still a tragedy, and as Forrest Gump would say with a tear in his eye, "That's all I have to say about that."

UMass women's soccer wins, ties first two contests

Minutewomen crush Albany, rally back to deadlock Orangewomen

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

ALBANY, NY – This was not the warm welcome that the University of Albany athletics program had planned on.

The Great Danes, in their first ever Division I contest in any sport, squared off with the Massachusetts women's soccer team on September 1 at Varsity Field in Albany. The hosts, however, probably wished that they had never stepped on to the field.

UMass dominated in every facet of the game and took control right from the opening kickoff. The Minutewomen scored six goals in the first half and cruised to a 6-0 win in their season opener.

"Once we got the first one, we kind of broke it open after that," said senior forward Emma Kurowski, who netted two goals in the winning effort. "Then we saw that they [Albany] were getting unorganized and we picked it up even more."

Sophomore midfielder Sarah Cook tallied two goals and an assist to lead UMass on the afternoon. Kurowski added two more goals, while Katelyn Jones and Kara Ciocca chipped in single scores. Junior forward Kara Green also assisted on three goals for the Minutewomen.

Overall, eight different players recorded at least a point for UMass in the victory.

"We have a lot of depth. It doesn't really matter who scores, because everyone can attack," Cook said. "That's one thing that has definitely changed from last year. We are a lot more deeper now."

Jones scored the first goal of the season six minutes into the game. The crafty left-footer bolted down the left flank and fired home the rebound of a shot by Green.

Just over six minutes last the onslaught continued, as Kurowski scored her first of the day. Twenty-two seconds later, the senior took a feed from Green and buried her second goal.

Green added another helper later in the half, this time finding Cook all alone in front of the cage. Cook then netted her second goal off a corner kick from Jones with 11 minutes to go in the half.

Ciocca and junior Kat Machamer then connected for the final goal of the game two minutes later. Immediately after the two players entered the game, Machamer lobbed a ball past the Albany defense to Ciocca, who tracked down the feed and deked out Great Danes keeper Michelle Talviste to make it 6-0.

"We were confidant and excited coming into the game. Even the freshmen weren't nervous," Cook said. "Everyone was ready to go."

Senior goalkeeper Angie Napoli was solid in net when tested, and recorded her first shutout of the season.

Despite the lackluster start in their first Division I game, Albany coach George Vizvary feels confident that things will improve as their season progresses.

Emma Kurowski and the UMass women's soccer team are looking like the Minutewomen of old as they began the season with strong showings.

AGAWAM, Mass. – Even though the Massachusetts women's soccer team has only played two games this season, you can already tell that things are going to be different than last year.

In 1998, the Minutewomen were 3-6 in games that were decided by one goal. And last Saturday night at Agawam High School against Syracuse University, it appeared that UMass was going to come out on the short end of another one-goal game.

However, UMass captain Robin Smith had something to say about that.

The senior midfielder for the Minutewomen launched a 35-yard bomb with 9:28 left in regulation to knot the score with the Orangewomen at 2-2. UMass sophomore goalkeeper Cori Stevens then made a host of spectacular saves down the stretch to ensure the stalemate with Syracuse.

"That was something that Kara [Green] and I worked on in practice yesterday. Ol' course, I didn't hit one in practice, but tonight I did," said Smith, who capped off her return the UMass lineup with the goal after missing all of last season because of an ankle injury. "She [Kara] played the ball nicely to me right into some open space, and the shot was wide open, so I took it."

Both teams had chances to win the game in regulation and in overtime, but neither could convert the game-winner. Nevertheless, the ability to rally back against Syracuse, a team that made the NCAA tournament last year, impressed UMass coach Jim Rudy.

"That's what I liked. We were under some pressure, but this team found the spirit and tradition of UMass soccer and didn't give up," he said. "That makes me feel good."

Syracuse (0-2-1), who is coached by former UMass All-American and Herman Trophy winner April Kater, struck first only 3:04 into the game on a goal by Jenna Szyluck.

The Minutewomen (1-0-1) came right back, though, as Emma Kurowski found the back of the net off a feed from Kate Webb. The goal was the third of the young season and 36th of her career for the Sutton native.

Syracuse regained the lead with about 15 minutes to play in the first half on a goal by Molly Schmeltz. The game stayed that way until Smith's controversial game-tying goal.

Kater and the Syracuse contingent claimed that the shot actually went over the net and not in. Regardless of their pleas, the goal stood and the game ended in the 2-2 tie.

"It wasn't a goal. It went over the net," she said. "That was pretty much our season that was called on that play, but it's typical. With the way that we've been playing, we should be 3-0 right now, but instead we're 0-2-1."

Shea, UMass field hockey put down interstate rivals

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

As the Massachusetts Field Hockey team geared up to face Boston College last night at Garber Field, a sense of impending doom hung in the air. Maybe it was the ferocious looking storm clouds that threatened overhead. Or it could have been the sting leftover from Saturday's tough overtime loss to Virginia.

But more than likely, it was the words of Coach Patty Shea that lent the contest a certain war-like feel. "This is our home. Nobody comes onto our field and walks off with a smile."

Shea's words proved prophetic, as the Minutewomen employed a balanced attack of ball control and aggressive defense in shutting out the Eagles by a final of 1-0. The rain may have held off, but the Maroon and White offensive attack was in high gear; UM out-shot BC 12-3 over the course of the game.

"We all realized the importance of coming out to win," Said senior midfielder Chrissy Millbauer. "Our goal is to be a powerhouse within the region, so this was an important game to win."

The few opportunities afforded the BC front line were quickly thwarted, as sophomore backs Anke Bruemmer, Jill Fantasia and Kerry Ann Jaggassar combined to form an iron curtain in front of the UM goal. Another solid effort between the pipes from junior Zowie Tucker spelled a long night for would-be Eagle scorers, as the Welsh sensation made a trio of spectacular saves to preserve the shutout.

The Maroon and White front line, meanwhile, kept BC keeper Jill Dedman sprawled on the turf for much of the contest. Superb penetration by forwards Nicole Bardell and Tamra Geryk led to a flurry of first-half scoring chances, most notably the Bardell drive-and-dish that set up the game's only goal. Co-captain Lucy Koch earned the score by gathering a loose ball off to the left of goal and tucking it past Dedman at the 28:19 mark.

"We made the goalkeeper play the ball and make decisions, which set up a lot of chances," Shea said. "Most goalies are afraid to play the ball."

As the game wore on, with neither team able to develop any real scoring threats, defense became the focal point. Millbauer used her incredible speed and stick handling skills to dominate the sidelines, spoiling a number of BC outlets and transitions.

"We really played hard and went after the ball," Millbauer said. "We didn't let them have too many touches."

So as the downtrodden Eagles left Garber Field, there were indeed very few smiles among them. Those were saved for a UM team that appears to have rediscovered its winning formula.

"We needed to learn how to bounce back." Shea said. "And winning a regional game is a great way."

UM soccer splits four on road

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

While most students were enjoying the end to their summer vacations, the Massachusetts men's soccer team was enduring a rough beginning to their 1999 season. After a difficult start the UMass team (2-2) has rebounded with two straight victories to even their record.

The University of New Hampshire dashed the hopes of an opening day win when they claimed the season opener over the visiting Minutemen 1-0 on a first half goal that found its way past UMass goalie Todd Fowler. UNH's keeper notched a shutout, stopping all five UMass shots.

Massachusetts next traveled south to Florida to take on No. 20 Jacksonville in the opening round of the Nike/IL Legends Tournament. The Dolphins tallied twice in the first half and once in the second to jump out to a 3-0 lead. The Minutemen found the back of the net for their first goal of the 1999 season when senior midfielder Todd Baron connected on a penalty kick in the 85th minute. The loss dropped UMass to 0-2 on the young season.

The bumpy road continued for the Minutemen when they matched up against Georgia State in the second round of the Legends Tournament. Georgia State, like UNH and Jacksonville before them, capitalized in the opening frame. The Panthers surprised the UMass out of the gate and before eleven minutes had ticked off the clock the maroon and white had given up two goals.

With the way the early season had been going offensively, the two-goal lead was an uphill climb for the Massachusetts squad. In their first two matches they had combined for only one goal. The offense, however, responded by scoring two first half goals and adding four more in the second half to blow out Georgia State 6-2 for the first victory of the year.

Just before halftime junior Matt Christy cut the Panthers' lead in half off an assist from Fred Kinateder. Kinateder added a goal to his assist when he scored unassisted less than a minute later to knot the game at two before half-time.

Freshman Jeff Deren gave UMass its first lead of the 1999 season when he found the back of the net at 71:49 of the contest. The Minutemen displayed their quick-strike capabilities again as they exploded for three more goals in the final 10 minutes to seal the victory. Senior forward Adam Black scored twice for the Minutemen and Jon Burr added his first of the year to power the Minutemen.

The offensive explosion in the second half gave the UMass team the edge in goal differential for the tournament, earning the Minutemen a second place finish overall. Three Massachusetts players were selected to the all tournament team. Forwards John Lytton and Seth Lilburn and defenseman J.R. Pounces earned the distinction as determined by the coaches of the four teams.

This Tuesday, the Minutemen returned to action against Hartford. The defensive effort that blanked Georgia State in the second half carried over into the Hartford game as UMass limited Hartford to just 10 shots and no goals behind Bryan O'Quinn's goaltending. The team did not give up an early goal, a mistake that had plagued the team through the first three games.

UMass, however, could not tally a goal of their own in the ninety- minute regulation and it took sudden death overtime to decide the match. The game was settled early in overtime when Todd Baron finally found a way past Hartford's Chris Doyle to even the Minutemen's record at 2-2.

UMass returns to action this Friday night when they face the University of Maine at 7 p.m. at Chicopee's Szot Park field.

UMass volleyball drops 3; Return to Cage tomorrow

By Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

The UMass volleyball team started its season over the weekend at the Long Beach State Invitational Tournament. The team had a rough tournament, as they began the season 0-3.

"It's tough when you come home 0-3," said Coach Bonnie Kenny. "I think they were just that much better than us."

In the first match, Kenny's squad put in a hard fought effort against the defending National Champions, Long Beach State, before losing to the 49ers, 15-4, 15-8, 15-8. Senior Kari Hogancamp led the way with nine kills and nine digs, just missing her first double-double of the year. Senior Jill Meyers added seven kills and eight digs while sophomore Heather Holtsberg performed well with 16 assists and six digs.

No. 5 Long Beach was slow out the gate in the first game, with only a 4-2 lead when it went on a 5-0 run to snag a 9-2 advantage. The match didn't get any easier for the women as the 49ers broke the game open with a 9-1 lead in game two. The Minutewomen responded with a 5-0 run of their own to cut the lead to 10-8. Long Beach was able to close out the game, however, as seniors Kristy Kierulff and Veronica Walls both had two kills down the stretch.

Game three was back and forth, as UM had the game tied at 8-8, after coming back from a 8-2 deficit, before LBSU rebounded, winning the game 15-8.

Jill Meyers

The tournament continued, as the Minutewomen faced UC-Santa Barbara. Once again, the team was unable to pull out a victory, as UCSB defeated UM 17-15,15-3,15-8.

The senior tandem Meyers and Hogancamp were the backbone of the team, as Meyers tallied her first double-double of the season with 10 kills and 11 digs and Hogancamp put up 13 digs and 6 kills. The seniors were helped out by the juniors, as Rebecca Hasson and Jennifer Drennan put in strong performances. Drennan posted 25 assists and 7 digs, while Hasson led the team in blocks with five.

UMass jumped out to an 8-0 lead in the first game of the match.

"I think we surprised them early on", said Kenny. "We really had a good chance to take that first game."

The Gauchos scored seven consecutive points to tie the game at 12-12. The Minutewomen had two chances to win having game point, but were eventually overcome 17-15.

UCSB took the second game easily 15-3, after putting up an 8-0 lead. UMass put up a fight in the third game, pushing the Gauchos to an 11-8 score. Santa Barbara took a timeout and closed the game and the match out, winning 15-8.

The third match of the weekend saw the Minutewomen blowing a giant two game lead to drop the match, 7-15, 5-15, 15-8, 15-8, 15-7 to the North Carolina Tarheels.

"The North Carolina game was very disappointing", Kenny said. "We just ran out of gas."

Once again, Meyers and Hogancamp put up big numbers, both registered double-doubles. Meyers led the team in kills with 24, along with 15 digs, while Hogancamp led the team with 24 digs, in addition to her 18 kills. Sophomore Janeen Demarte chipped in with 12 kills and nine digs and Lymarie Llovet tallied 15 digs.

Diggs battles OSU lore; VTech could spoil BCS picture

By Chris Dufresne
Los Angeles Times

COLUMBUS, Ohio -- You wondered if Na'il Diggs knew what he was up against as he leaned on the glass trophy case that lines monument wall at the Woody Hayes Athletic Center.

Diggs pressed against the encased reminders of excellence in this corridor of Ohio State prizes: six Heisman trophies, five Lombardis, four Outlands, four Maxwells, a Butkus Award here, a Biletnikoff there.

Diggs didn't even notice the faces staring back: Howard "Hopalong" Cassady, Wayne Woodrow Hayes, Les Horvath, Archie Griffin, the Rex Kern-led team photograph of 1968, that last championship season.

Three years ago, in fact, Diggs didn't know Columbus from Kalamazoo. Truth be known, he had his back set on leaning against the trophy case at Heritage Hall at USC. He should not have been here today, sweating in summer camp, an Angeleno on Ohio soil.

"True, very true," Diggs says. "If that wouldn't have happened, I wouldn't be here today. It gave me a new base as to how to look at how things happen in your life at any time, anywhere. It might not even be something that deals with you." In Diggs' case, it certainly didn't.

The former Dorsey (Los Angeles) High star had committed to play for John Robinson at USC before an incident totally unrelated, yet very closely related sent him on a trek to the unknown.

Diggs' sister, Roslyn, was dating USC basketball Coach Charlie Parker at the time. When Athletic Director Mike Garrett fired Parker in February of 1996, he lost a coach and a future All-American linebacker.

In the wake of Parker's firing, Diggs' revoked his commitment to USC and began shopping for a new school. Na'il leaned heavily on his older sister Roslyn, who raised him after the death of their mother.

"I only had one trip left," Diggs recalls. "I knew I had to nail it down to one place. I was really looking at Arizona, but my sister made some calls around. I didn't know anything about Ohio State. They were basically done with recruiting. They had taken all their staff reports down. They didn't know who I was."

Ohio State Coach John Cooper doesn't need recruiting gifts to keep his program in the national title hunt year after year. But he's more than willing to take handouts.

"His sister calls me and tells me what happened with Charlie Parker," Cooper says. As for Na'il?

"Oh, we knew who he was," Cooper continues, "but we didn't have a chance to recruit him. He was going to Southern Cal. When a local kid commits to Southern Cal, we're not going to change that. But she called me up and opened the door to a good player, and he is a good player." Better than good.

After playing defensive end his freshman season, Diggs was switched to outside linebacker last season with wondrous results.

Massachusetts lands two Ws

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Last year, the UMass men's water polo and Queens College battled to the gun with every match in which they took the pool. The rivalry was building, but nonetheless, it would seem fortunate that the Minutemen were able to dodge Queens in last weekend's Navy Invitational.

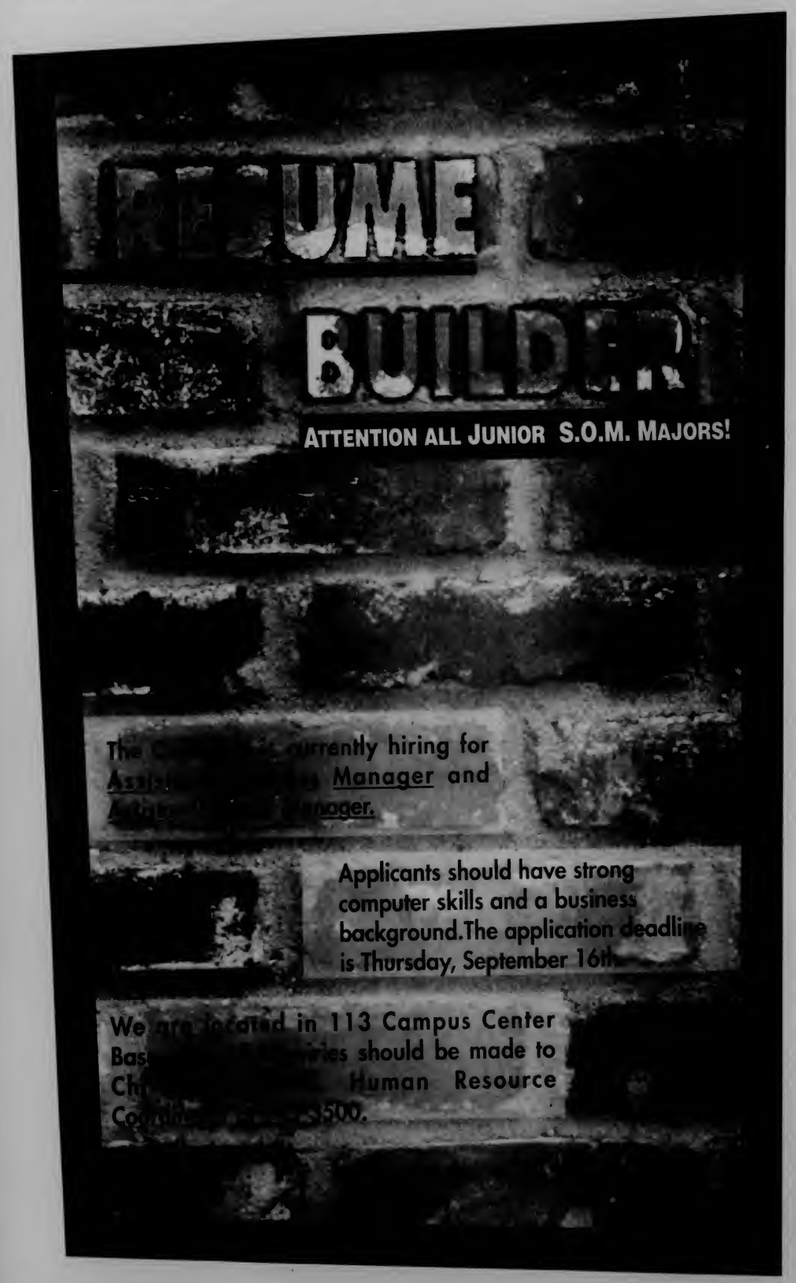
Instead, they discovered and up and coming power that sent them packing without a much sought first-place finish. Despite the loss, UMass picked up three key victories to open up the season, many thanks to senior leadership on both sides of the ball.

UMass got off to a great start to the tournament, manhandling the U.S. Naval Academy "B" squad, 15-1. Seniors Rich Slingluff, Timmy Troupis and Pat Kain each tallied a hat trick, getting help from Greg Traver and Adam Moore, who combined for three goals themselves.

Next up was George Washington, who gave the Minutemen trouble in last year's Eastern Championships, a game that finally saw UMass move onto the next round with a 9-7 victory. This time around was not a cakewalk either, as the Minutemen held on for a 9-6 win, thanks to three goals apiece by Kain and Cory Koenemann.

Tommy Troupis

As Kain's production stopped, so did the Minutemen. Kain went scoreless UMass' battle with St. Francis, a team the Minutemen defeated three times last season. UMass used a balanced attack, getting scores from five different players, but St. Francis were able to play a balanced offense of its own, knocking the Minutemen off, 12-7. Slingluff notched two of his seven weekend goals in the loss, while Brady Hahn, Justin Houck, Adam Moore and Greg Traver each chipped in with a goal. St. Francis picked their spots on All-America-caliber goaltender Richard Huntley, scoring the most goals on the senior in his last ten starts going back to last season.



Huntley got his revenge in the third-place game. The goalie got a rare shot at seeing his name on the scoreboard, posting a two-point goal in a 9-5 victory over Navy. Overall, though, it was Troupis that highlighted the Minuteman attack, registering four goals to go along with single tallies by Koenemann, Slinglufl and Traver.

On the weekend, Huntley made 22 saves, 19 of which were in the final three games of the Invitational.

Despite a solid performance throughout, again the Minutemen went home disappointed, taking third place a year after they dropped a heartbreaker to Queens College, 8-7, which was good for second.

UMass will return home this weekend when they host the Collegiate Water Polo Association League Tournament, inviting Harvard, Boston College, Brown and M.I.T. to Amherst College. The festivities open for the Maroon and White when they take on the Crimson of Harvard, a team in which they have a 22-9 overall record against, including 14-4 rout last season. After another matinee start with BC, the Minutemen close out with a double-dip nightcap, most notably a date with the Bears. In 1997, Brown took two of three from the Minutemen over the course of the season.

Coming home from the Navy Invitational with an unblemished record might have been too tall a task for UMass men's water polo coach Russ Yarworth, having to play for the first time with all-time leading scorer Brian Stahl.

Pennant races to grab the attention of today's fans

It's September and the baseball pennant races are in full swing. Forget about Sammy Sosa and Mark McGwire's chase for the homerun title or the resignation of 22 umpires. Instead, consider that some of baseball's least recognizable teams are fighting for their playoff lives.

With so much emphasis put on the long ball fans could be missing out on one of the craziest Septembers in recent history. When Major League Baseball went to three divisions and added a wild card this is what they wanted. For the first time they might get it.

Bryan Smith
on League Baseball

Everyone gave the New York Yankees the American League title before the season ever started, but grabbing at their heals are the two best offenses in hardball this year in the Cleveland Indians and the Texas Rangers. Both teams have been posting runs at a torrid pace all season and neither is sputtering this late in the season.

All three of these teams possess legitimate MVP contenders in Derek Jeter of the Yankees, Manny Ramirez of the Indians, and Rafael Palmeiro of the Rangers. With the Bronx Bombers in a downward spiral and a potential Divisional Playoff matchup with the Rangers the edge goes to the Indians for the AL crown.

The Indians may not have the best pitching staff in the American League, but with an offense like theirs, it will be hard to beat them. Remember, too that the Indians almost took down the Yanks in the ALCS last year.

With the races for the divisions all but wrapped up, the Wild Card is taking center stage. The Red Sox are winners of 10 of their last thirteen games after splitting a pair with the Oakland Athletics.

The Red Sox hold a three-game lead over the Athletics, which should make for an exciting stretch run. Boston's premier players Pedro Martinez and Nomar Garciaparra are running on all cylinders after both slumping in the month of July and early August. Martinez, who was slow to come back from shoulder problems has been his dominant self winning his last two starts and is the AL's only 20-game winner. Garciaparra is also turning it on after a groin injury hobbled him for most of the summer.

The young A's lack of veteran, experienced players should keep them from catching Boston. Youthful exuberance brought them to the brink of the Wild Card, but Ben Grieve, Jason Giambi, and Matt Stairs will not push them over the top.

Not to be forgotten are the Toronto Blue Jays. Though mired in a slump, they too have one of the youngest, most exciting teams with budding superstars in Shaun Green and Carlos Delgado. The boys from north of the border picked a poor time to get cold after having a hot July. The Jays may have hit the wall, but do come into Boston later this month for a series that could determine who faces Cleveland in the Divisional Series.

Over in the senior circuit the races are even hotter. All three divisions are up for grabs which will send two teams packing for home come early October.

The best race is for the Central Division title. The Houston Astros with the league's premier lineup went in a mid-season swoon, which opened the door for the Cincinnati Reds to climb into contention.

The Astros have sat atop the division all season long and their post-season experience should keep the their for the remainder of the season. Jeff Bagwell could possibly be the National League MVP and with Jose Lima posting a 19-7 record to go along with Mike Hampton's 18-5 mark, Houston could contend for the league championship. The Astros also have the intimidating closer that all teams wish they had in September in Billy Wagner.

In the East the Atlanta Braves saw themselves out of first place in the division for one day since 1945. That day came in August when the New York Mets crept to a half game lead.

The Mets made some of the best moves in baseball when they signed gold glove third baseman Robin Ventura in the off-season. The move turned the already steady Mets infield into baseball's best. The signing of Ventura meant that Edgardo Alfonzo had to move to second base where he has only committed three errors all season. The move paid great dividends and with a nucleus that already contained Mike Piazza and John Olerud the Flushing boys are for real.

The Mets also made a key move when they traded for Kenny Rogers and Billy Taylor. Both players will play a key role in their push for the division title.

Atlanta's vaunted pitching staff of Greg Maddux, Tom Glavine, John Smoltz, and Kevin Millwood should be enough to hold off the Mets when playoff time roles around. John Rocker is the big game closer that the Braves lacked in their past title runs and could propel them to league title. Chipper Jones is also putting up the biggest power numbers of his career in the absence of now recovered cancer victim Andres Galarraga. The Braves are out to prove something this year and are for real this time with baseball's best record.

Moving out west the Arizona Diamondbacks have proven that money can buy almost anything, including a division title. At the beginning of the season everyone thought the Los Angeles Dodgers would run away with the division, but with a team stacked with marquee names the chemistry was just not there.

Randy Johnson the games most feared pitcher is contesting Nolan Ryan's strikeout record. Luis Gonzalez posted a 30-game hitting streak earlier in the year and Matt Williams is finally putting up Matt Williams-like numbers. The late season addition of Matt Mantei finished the triumvirate of division leaders with great closers.

A late season surge by the San Francisco Giants has them clawing for a shot at the coveted division title. With Barry Bonds on one of the hottest streaks of power in his career the Giants have an outside shot at taking over the lead. Jeff Kent and Russ Ortiz have also provided strong campaigns, which allowed the Giants to remain in contention while Bonds was on the disabled list.

September has just begun and the excitement has already mounted. Fans in some of baseball's best cities have teams in contention for division titles and wild card births. There is an outside shot that we could have either a "Subway Series" between the Yankees and the Mets or another "Battle of the Bay" between Oakland and San Francisco, but don't count on it just yet. There is still a lot of baseball to be played and anything could happen in this wide-open chase for a World Series title.

And if you can't avoid it, look to Sosa and McGwire and wonder if 70 home runs can be surpassed.

UMass was all over the Tar Heels early on, as they went up two games hitting .502 (16-3-15) in the first. UNC was unphased, however, coming back from the large deficit to win the final three games of the match.

While the team battled gallantly its attack percentage of just .117 cannot last. Meyers and Hogancamp who have led the team in kills the past two seasons, could manage just a .196 and .160 hitting percentages, respectively. Despite the low numbers, Hogancamp's overall performance earned her WHMP Athlete-of-the-Week honors.

"I'm happy for Kari, even though we were 0-3 on the weekend, they still decided to acknowledge her for her skill", said Kenny.

Jennifer Drennan and Heather Holtsberg platooned at the setter position with Drennan running the show against Long Beach before being replaced by Holtsberg in the remaining two matches of the weekend.

The Minutewomen return home this weekend for the UMass Invitational when they welcome Seton Hall, New Hampshire, Southern Mississippi and Michigan State into the Curry Hicks Cage for a weekend bonanza. They will first duel with the Pirates of SHL at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Fantasy Football makes the season worthwhile

Why don't you play pro football? You love it, right? You devote as many hours every Sunday to the games as those big oafs do, right? Eight, ten hours?

So, why don't you play pro ball?

You're not in good enough shape, that's why. While Junior Seau can bench press your weight and his put together, you have a hard time picking up yourself up on Saturday morning.

So, instead, you coach. That makes sense, right? That's why Indo Bill Parcells is on the sidelines. Seau would kill him, too.

Every Sunday, you and me and everybody who even casually keeps up with football sits down in front of the television to watch a quarterback, two running-back two wideouts, a tight end, a defense and a kicker to evaluate their respective performances.

It's not just football season, it's Fantasy Football season. Sometimes called Rotisserie, sometimes given a custom name that the participants in a given "league" prefer, Fantasy Football adds an exciting element to each and every weekend of NFL action.

For those sports fans out there who aren't in the loop, Rotisserie Football is a simple concept.

A bunch of regular guys and girls get together and assemble a league. At a time convenient for everyone involved, the group sits down for a "draft", at which time the league's "coaches" pick, much in the same manner that real NFL coaches choose college stars each April, pro players that score in high quantities. Draft picks are made based on how a given player, or team defense, gains points over the course of the previous season.

Points are scored by yards attained, touchdowns, field goals or, in the case of a defense, interceptions and fumble recoveries.

As the common fan, engaged in a fantasy league, you are no longer completely wrapped up in only the local team. You pay attention to whatever teams employ the players on your "team".

For you, the game becomes so much more. You learn the stat lines of players you previously didn't know existed – the Bernie Parmalees and Ike Hillards of the league. This interaction with the league makes you more aware, and it is exactly what NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue loves to see. Fans care now, more than ever before, what's going on in the world of pro football.

I'm lucky. I'm a huge Patriots fan and both Drew Bledsoe and Ben Coates are on both of my two rotisserie teams. Now, in a number of leagues, money is at stake, so basically, as go the Pats, so goes my cash flow.

It's exciting, kids. I won't deny it. With my team, "The Metal Militia" pitted against Daily Hampshire Gazette staffer Matt Vantour's fantasy squad this weekend, I will eagerly watch to see how my star WR, Antonio Freeman, does compared to his leading pass-catcher.

It's a strategic game. Who, from your drafted roster of starters and backups, will you decide to put on the "field" for Sunday's game? Is the tailback currently on your bench going on a tear? Maybe you don't have a choice because your regular starter's team is having a bye week and, as a result, isn't even playing.

In one of my leagues, we "play" two quarterbacks each week, and already my second signal caller is of no use to me. San Diego's Jim Harbaugh, Bledsoe's second fiddle on the Militia, isn't in action. As a result, I am forced to play Steve Beuerlein from the hapless Carolina Panthers. At running-back? I haven't quite decided. Dolphins skipper Jiminy Johnson is high on rookie head-case Cecil Collins, while Terry Allen could carry the load left by Robert Edwards in New England.

As you can see, there's more to the NFL every Sunday than nachos and beer. You and I have important decisions to make, my friend. The nachos and beer just help an awful lot.

After tight first half, UVA proves too tough

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

What happens when an unstoppable force hits an immovable object?

That question was on the mind of many at Richard F. Garber Field on Saturday, as field hockey powerhouses Massachusetts and Virginia squared off in a battle of N C A A Tournament mainstays. And in the end, the Cavaliers proved too much for the Minutewomen, who bowed 2-1 in overtime.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Lucy Koch

The Maroon and White carried a mixture of apprehension and hope into the game, having lost 2-0 at Virginia last September. The apprehension? UM's last win over VA came way back in 1992. The hope? VA's first-year coach had only four starters returning from last year's Final Four squad. The stage was set for a power shift in collegiate field hockey.

The contest more than lived up to its billing, as the teams remained deadlocked in a scoreless first half. The UM backfield put the handcuffs on their Cav' counterparts from the get-go, highlighted by a series of stellar defensive stops by junior Patty Robinson.

Neither team could solve the opposition's traps early, so the respective coaches went quickly to their drawing boards in an attempt to break the stalemate. UM skipper Patty Shea called on sophomore Anke Bruemmer to use her deceptive mobility to beat the UVA midfield, while Cav coach Jessica Wilk implored her troops to utilize the sidelines for quicker transitions. Both teams swarmed the nets, trying mightily for a loose ball to tuck away.

These adjustments wouldn't pay dividends until midway through the second half, when Virginia's Meredith Elwell redirected a Lorraine Lizzuso shot from outside the circle that slipped past UM keeper Zowie Tucker for a 1-0 UVA lead.

The Minutewomen answered with just 2:04 left in regulation, when junior Tamra Geryk deflected a blast from teammate Kristen Schmidt that beat UVA keeper Becky Worthington. Geryk, a transfer from Michigan, notched 16 points for the Wolverines last season.

Overtime would belong to the Cavs, however. At the 2:28 mark of the extra set, UVA's Jessica Coleman gathered up a loose ball on the right side of the UM goal and launched a cruise missile just under the outstretched Tucker into the left corner of the net. The game, and any thoughts of a field hockey "changing of the guard", was over.

MINUTEWOMEN NOTES... There were a few bright spots for the Maroon and White, even in defeat. Welsh native Tucker put forth a sterling effort in goal, stopping 11 shots, including all four of UVA's penalty-corner attempts. Schmidt continued to be one of the Minutewomen's premier frontline presences, notching her first assist of the season.

Diggs teamed with Andy Katzenmoyer and Jerry Rudzinski to form perhaps the best linebacking trio in the country.

Katzenmoyer, the 1997 Butkus Award winner, hogged most of the headlines, but most people who followed Ohio State last year thought Diggs had the better season.

That suspicion was confirmed when the sophomore Diggs, not Katzenmoyer, was named to the Big Ten Conference's first team at linebacker.

Diggs has recorded a team-high 12 sacks the last two seasons, but also knows that opponents' double-team blocks on Katzenmoyer made some of that possible.

This year will be different. Katzenmoyer and Rudzinski are gone, and now Diggs is the marked man.

"This year, I'm in the Andy role, getting double-teamed, getting cut (blocked) and all that good stuff," Diggs says.

"That's what I've prepared for, early on." Diggs got all he wanted in Ohio State's opening loss to Miami in the Kickoff Classic; he was an even bigger target with two Ohio State linebackers suspended for disciplinary reasons.

Still, Diggs was a bright spot on a day Ohio State gave up 398 total yards, 155 on the ground.

"I never thought a team could run on us like that," Diggs said afterward.

He finished with seven tackles, four for a loss, with one sack. After a week off, Ohio State hosts UCLA this weekend in Columbus.

Had Diggs gone to USC, he would have faced the Trojans' cross-town rival three or four times in his college career.

Given the Trojan's eight-game losing streak to the Bruins, maybe it's best Diggs is taking on UCLA once, from afar.

Diggs thinks it's a shame the game has lost some of its luster with 11 UCLA players sitting out suspensions in the well-chronicled handicapped-parking scandal.

"I mainly feel sorry for them," he says of the suspended players. "But it really doesn't matter. It doesn't change my attitude as to how I'm going to prepare for them. I'm pretty sure there'll be somebody in there that will step up to play."

Diggs has no regrets on how things ended up, although the first winter in Columbus was cold and lonely.

He warmed up to the town after his first trip to Ohio Stadium on game day.

"I can't describe in words how that feels," Diggs says. "To run into that stadium was probably the best thing I've experienced in college other than beating Michigan."

Yet, there are still pangs for home. He keeps in touch with USC players, and assistant coach Dennis Thurman.

"All my (USC) friends say, 'You know, you should have been here,'" Diggs says. "And I say, 'Yeah. I should have, but I'm not the one that did all that stuff.'"

Imagine a linebacker tandem of Diggs and Chris Claiborne the last two seasons at USC. Diggs has thought about it.

"It's hard to say," he says. "The coaching staff has changed so much, who knows what position I would have played? It worked out."

BCS could be another disaster

It's never too early to look for schools that might muck up this year's bowl championship series rankings formula.

Our September pick: Virginia Tech.

Last year, Kansas State could have finished unbeaten and been denied a place in the national championship game had Tennessee and UCLA also finished undefeated. The BCS avoided the nightmare when UCLA and Kansas State lost Dec. 5, setting up the Tennessee-Florida State final.

This year, Virginia Tech may be the BCS party crasher.

Assuming the Hokies can survive the injury to freshman quarterback Michael Vick, they have a good shot of going 11-0 yet not finishing either first or second in the BCS standings.

Why? Virginia Tech is in the Big East, the weakest of the BCS bowl-guaranteed conferences, and plays a tepid nonconference slate of James Madison, Alabama Birmingham and Clemson. The only "juice" games on the board are at Virginia on Oct. 2 and a Nov. 13 home showdown against Miami.

Given the strength-of-schedule component in the BCS rankings, Virginia Tech could finish unbeaten and easily get squeezed out by a one-loss Florida or Penn State.

Wouldn't it be great?

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) - You may want to change the way you do certain things at home today, but only on a temporary basis. You can benefit from a change in routine.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) - What has been practiced most recently can serve you best when the time comes for the "real thing". A contest can be won.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) - The most obvious answer isn't likely the one that you'll want to believe in when the chips are down. Conduct your own investigation and discover the truth!

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) - Things that are difficult for a close friend are likely to be easy for you, and vice versa. You can help each other out today.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 10) - An unexpected discovery takes your day in a new direction, and you'll be prepared for something new and different when all is said and done.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) - You should be able to do the "impossible" today for at least the second time this week! Friends and loved ones are universally impressed.

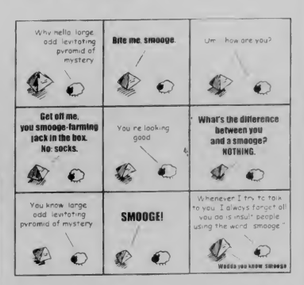
Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) - A change of scene can work wonders today, especially if you're suffering from any kind of creative block. New surroundings can be inspiring.

Aries (March 20-April 19) - Someone "in charge" may be counting on you to go above and beyond the call of duty and perform a "miracle" today. You can oblige, with pleasure.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) - You may want to change the way you do something today, just to see how things are on the "other side of the fence." Soon, you'll be coming back home!

Gemini (May 21-June 20) - How you start your day makes all the difference. You don't want things to seem so unsettled that you're unable to make immediate progress.

Cancer (June 21-July 22) - You'll be impressed by an unexpected encounter with someone who seems to have all the answers. You may realize that you have a great many, too!



Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) - What ultimately begins in the most routine fashion today is likely to offer you the greatest rewards. All sorts of surprises are in store.

Mac heads U.S. tennis

By Rachel Alexander
The Washington Post

FLUSHING MEADOWS, N.Y. – After six years under the reserved and thoughtful direction of Tom Gullikson, the U.S. Davis Cup team got an injection of brash enthusiasm yesterday when John McEnroe was named its captain.

McEnroe, 40, who has been campaigning for the job for years, should bring a much higher profile to the Davis Cup squad, attracting more fans and better players to compete in the international team event. He swore yesterday that he will be better behaved as coach than he was during his storied playing career although his unflinching frankness was still in evidence as he accepted his new role.

"Needless to say, it's one of the proudest moments of my life," McEnroe said before motioning to Judy Levering, the president of the USTA. "Apparently it took this wonderful lady to show some guts finally, and I appreciate that."

The USTA has shied away from the outspoken McEnroe in the past, but Levering said she decided to finally select him after getting input from Pete Sampras, Andre Agassi, Jim Courier and Todd Martin, who are all likely candidates to play Davis Cup in the near future. Gullikson, whose birthday is yesterday, was popular with the players for his calm, sensitive demeanor, but he was heavily criticized for his mishandling of the quarterfinal series in July in which the United States lost to Australia.

When it became clear earlier this month that Gullikson's job was in trouble, Sampras said he would not play for any other captain. Yesterday, however, Levering said she had Sampras' "blessing" on hiring McEnroe. Agassi, who has declined to participate in Davis Cup in recent years, also praised the decision, virtually assuring that he will be back on the team when it starts play again in February.

"I think he's going to be the best captain [of] by far," Agassi said. "I wanted a say-so – as well as all the other players having a say-so in who was going to be captain, and we had closed-door meetings where it was pretty unanimous. Having John will make a huge difference. Now all we have to do is get [him] on board to play.

Duquette, Daubach smile as post-season draws near

Jen Cormier

Ah yes, September hardball is upon us. This is baseball at its best, a time when pennant chases and wild card races climax, records are shattered, and hardball lore is created. Autumn is the zenith of the avid baseball fan's year, especially if that fan's allegiance is with the '99 Red Sox.

Of course, to experience the fall drama, a team first must have a decent summer – and the dog days have been pretty enjoyable for Red Sox Nation.

Remember waaaaay back in April, when various self-proclaimed baseball Nostradamuses (myself included) predicted a lackluster season for the Sox? Well, after a summer of hot streaks, slumps, and yes, a controversy or two, the Sox have held their own in a heated wild-card battle, proving the doomsayers wrong (so far). Here's a list of summer superlatives for the Olde Towne Team, Class of '99:

Best Management Move: The benching of Pedro Martinez. Jimy Williams made his message clear. If you're not on time, you ride the pine – even if you are the team's $75 million ace. Sentencing Martinez to mop-up duty showed the ace that he is not exempt from the rules and solidified the other players' respect for Williams. Pedro was wrong, Jimy was right. 'Nuff said.

Team Spirit Award: Who else but Tim Wakefield deserves this honor? Wakefield has served as the team plumber, plugging leaks in the bullpen and starting rotation all season long. When Tom Gordon went down, Wakefield made an almost seamless transition from starter to closer. When Bret Saberhagen succumbed to his aching shoulder, Wakefield returned to the starting rotation to take his place. Most recently, Mr. Versatile served as a long relief crunch to Ramon Martinez, who was slightly shaky during his first major league start since shoulder surgery. Wakefield does it all without complaint – there's no question that he is willing to put the team before himself.

Tenth Man Award: Brian who? If you went up to people at the beginning of the season and told them that Brian Daubach would play a pivotal role in the Sox lineup, they might look at you as though you'd told them that Pete Carroll has excellent job security. Daubach has delighted the Fenway fandom, most notably when he smashed a bases clearing double off The Wall to snatch a come-from-behind win from the Oakland A's. While his numbers have slumped recently, the former perennial minor leaguer is still a strong candidate for AL Rookie of the Year.

Shut Up and Play Award: What's with Red Sox starting pitchers, anyway? Oil Can Boyd mastered the art of the temper tantrum and Roger Clemens whined about having to carry his own luggage. Now Pedro. He roasted Williams after his (deserved) benching. He pouted when his teammates didn't take his side. He announced that he couldn't wait for the season to end so he could go home. He lashed out at General Manager Dan Duquette in the locker room, demanding to know when Williams was going to apologize to him. Remember when teammates jokingly strapped Martinez to a pole in the dugout and taped his mouth shut? They must have known about his big mouth all along.

Dual Personalities Award: Correctly guessing how Mark Portugal will perform is like accurately predicting Jimy Williams' next line-up – it can't be done. On August 4, Portugal dismantled the formidable Cleveland Indians with an 8 2/3 innings masterpiece. He hasn't won a game since. His ERA since that win? 6.14. If Portugal cannot find a happy medium between great and gruesome, he does not deserve the ball if the Sox make the playoffs. Period.

PREREQUISITE: ADRENALINE

Drive. Intensity. Those aren't words you're likely to see in many course requirements. Then again Army ROTC is unlike any other elective. It's hands-on excitement. ROTC will challenge you mentally and physically through intense leadership training. Training that builds your character, confidence and decision-making skills. Again, words other courses seldom use. But they're the credits you need to succeed in life. ROTC is open to freshmen and sophomores without obligation and requires about five hours per week. Register this term for Army ROTC.

Honors College hopes for greater diversity

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

In the face of criticism that the University of Massachusetts Commonwealth College is racially homogenous, university administrators are hoping to boost the number of minority students enrolled in the new honors program.

According to Kay Scanlan, assistant vice-chancellor for communications, there are 590 first-year students currently enrolled in the Commonwealth College, and of these 590 students 510 have reported their race. Of these 510 students, two are African-American, seven are Hispanic, and 38 are Asian – making approximately 9 percent of the Commonwealth students racial minorities, as opposed to the 15 to 16 percent of Asian, Latino/a, African and Native American (ALANA) students in the entire freshman class.

Fourteen entering Commonwealth freshmen are international students, and their races are unspecified.

"I think we have to see how we can improve these numbers," said Scanlan. "That's the first thing – figuring out why they're so low. And I do think that next year there will be an effort to attract more students of color to the Commonwealth College.

"We're still looking to see if there are admitted ALANA students who would qualify for Commonwealth College, but did not decide to join," Scanlan said. "And also, we have a very small percentage of blacks and Hispanics [on campus] in the first place."

Nelson Acosta, the director of ALANA Affairs, condemned the Commonwealth College's lack of diversity.

"If you have just two African-American students, and seven Latino students, that's just ludicrous," he said. "The Commonwealth College is a very segregated institution right now."

One of Acosta's objections is the use of SAT scores as a major criterion in the acceptance of freshmen into the Commonwealth College. Most freshmen Commonwealth students have SAT scores of 1300 or higher.

"We all know SATs are biased," he said. "How many ALANA and working class students have a 1300 on their SATs? People claim it's a matter of intelligence, and we know it's not.

"Maybe I should create a test that white people do badly on, and use it to [reject] white students from the Commonwealth College," he added.

Acosta suggested that the University consider interviews, recommendations and class rank more heavily in admissions.

Meredith Lind, the director of program development and administration, stated that under current Commonwealth College admissions standards, high school students with 3.5 grade point averages [GPA], 1300 or more on their SATs that rank in the top ten percent of their graduating class, are automatically given the opportunity to join the Commonwealth College. Other considerations are made, however, such as leadership qualities.

"The Admissions Office looks at more than just SATs," she said. "Grade point average, rank and SAT scores are just the basic qualifications. We invite students in on their whole records."

Lind said that she expected the number of minority students in the Commonwealth College to increase as time passes.

"It's been true for some time that of the students [entering the University] in the fall semester, eight or nine percent are in the honors program. But as time goes by, more students join, and there's a net gain in the minority students in the program. Graduating senior classes have about 13 percent minority students [in the honors program]."

She also pointed out that Linda Nolan, the director of the honors program, is Native American.

"Linda used to be very active in minority groups," she said.

Lind stated that the University is attempting to increase minority enrollment in the Commonwealth College by offering more scholarships to academically talented students.

Prosecutor probing Kremlin searched

By Richard C. Paddock
Los Angeles Times

MOSCOW – the home of suspended Prosecutor General Yuri I. Skuratov was searched Thursday by investigators from his own office who apparently were seeking documents connected to an ongoing probe of alleged Kremlin corruption.

Skuratov, who has been outspoken in recent days about widespread graft in Russia, said investigators searched his Moscow apartment, his main residence outside the city and his mother-in-law's apartment in what he maintained was an attempt to silence him.

"The search was clearly an act of intimidation," he said by telephone. "Today's incident goes to show that the Kremlin is still ready to go to any lengths and commit any violations of the law in order to intimidate me and hush me up."

Officially, the investigators were seeking evidence in a case against the prosecutor general.

Skuratov was suspended by President Boris N. Yeltsin in April after a man closely resembling the prosecutor general was shown on state-run television in bed with two women – neither his wife.

Skuratov, who has gone to court to keep his job, alleges that Yeltsin's inner circle wants to force him out because his investigation of alleged Kremlin kickbacks was hitting too close to the mark.

In recent days, the suspended prosecutor has given numerous interviews, including one to the Los Angeles Times in which he said his office was investigating whether 780 current and former officials abused their positions by trading in high-yield government securities.

On Tuesday, he told NTV television that a Swiss businessman – whose company, Mabetex, received $300 million in contracts to renovate Kremlin properties – paid the bills for credit cards issued in the name of Yeltsin and his two daughters. Skuratov said in the interview that investigators need to determine whether Yeltsin was aware of the credit cards.

Skuratov maintained that Thursday's searches were not legal because a judge has ruled that an extension of the probe into his activities violates Russian law.

Skuratov said it was apparent from the way the investigators conducted the search that they were actually looking for documents related to Mabetex. "They wanted to know which specific documents I possessed," he said. "They wanted to know for sure what I've got on them."

In the end, after a search that lasted seven hours, the investigators took suits, family photos, video tapes and what Skuratov called irrelevant documents.

"Apparently the Kremlin administration is still too much afraid of me to leave me alone," he said. "It is very important to them to do everything possible to make sure I do not return to office."

Timor targets priests

By Keith B. Richburg
Washington Post

JAKARTA, Indonesia – A systematic campaign of political assassinations appears to be under way in East Timor, with reported murders of Roman Catholic priests, student leaders and other supporters of independence for the territory in recent days during the violence engineered by Indonesian troops and their allied local militias.

The slayings were described by Western diplomats, Vatican media and East Timorese resistance sources. The 82-year-old father of East Timor independence leader Xanana Gusmao, was among the victims, said Ana Gomes, who heads Portugal's diplomatic mission in Jakarta.

Gomes also confirmed the death of the head of the Vatican-sponsored Caritas charity in Dili, the East Timorese capital. Vatican media, citing local sources, assailed the slaying of three priests and nearly 100 other people at a church complex in Suai. Most East Timorese are Roman Catholics, while Indonesia is predominantly Muslim.

The battered port of Dili was under a thick pall of smoke Thursday from burning buildings and offices, according to an amateur videotape that emerged Thursday. Debris filled the streets and the city appeared deserted except for soldiers and militiamen.

The videotape also showed hun-

Parking permits restrict spaces in downtown Amherst

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

As the new school year begins, parking permits further restrict spaces in Amherst for campus commuters. The permits will affect three areas of Amherst, including the town center and two residential areas.

"The permits are an attempt to assemble some order and to make the town's parking systems more functional," said Jonathan Tucker, a senior planner with the Amherst Planning department.

The lack of reserved spaces for residents and employees has been an issue within the town for many years. The parking permits will prevent campus commuters from utilizing advantageous spaces while they spend the day on campus. The Planning department hopes that the new enforcement of permits will assure that there are available spaces for residents and others who have no other alternative.

Commuters include students, staff and faculty at UMass and Amherst College, who Tucker said "can park on campus." He said Hampshire, Mount Holyoke and Smith college students commuting to town for the day often park and then walk or take a bus to campus.

"We [the Planning department] are aware that parking has gone up on campus and for that reason want to make sure that commuter parking does not inhibit residents and employees from access," Tucker said.

One of the most affected areas is the center of town and the surrounding area. Residents of houses and apartments on the affected streets and employees at downtown businesses can purchase parking permits from the town. The cost of permits will be $10 per year for residents and $25 per year for employees. The other two areas that will be affected are the intersection of Allen Street and Nutting Avenue and the west end of McClellan Street.

The residential permits will only allow the people who live on those streets to park there. In the past, many residents have been unable to park on their own streets due to the excessive amount of campus commuters.

The planning department hopes that the parking permits in town will force commuters to work with their campus parking services to improve their own parking conditions.

"There should be plenty of room to park at UMass and Amherst College," said Tucker. UMass Parking Services was unavailable for comment.

Israeli jails release 199 Palestinian prisoners as part of peace pact

By Rebecca Trounson and Tracy Wilkinson
Los Angeles Times

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip – Sentenced to seven life terms in prison, Fehti Kadoura Saleh stepped into newfound freedom Thursday, embraced friends and relatives he had not seen for years and struggled to reconcile his violent past with today's talk of peace.

Kadoura-Saleh was one of 199 Palestinians released from Israeli jails just after dawn Thursday in the first tangible result of the interim peace accord signed early this week by Israel Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Jubilant crowds gathered to greet the prisoners in Gaza and throughout the West Bank. They were celebrating the return of men many Israelis view as terrorists but Palestinians regard as heroes of their struggle for a homeland.

At the same time, many of those released, fighters whose acts of violence against Israelis or Palestinian collaborators earned them years in prison, were at pains to note that the times – and the terms of their struggle – have changed.

"The language of war is over," said Omran Hussein, 33, who served 14 years for wounding seven Israeli soldiers, as he sat in the shaded patio of his home in a West Bank refugee camp. "We are in the stage of peace."

The release of Palestinian prisoners is the first concrete evidence that the long-stalled peace process is back on track, and it breathes life into Barak's commitment to reach a final settlement of the decades-old conflict within a year. It is to be followed, perhaps as early as Friday, by the transfer of several more slivers of West Bank land to partial Palestinian control, the first stage of redeployments promised under agreement signed Sept. 5 at the Egyptian resort of Sharm-el-Sheikh.

On Monday, the anniversary of the 1993 signing of the landmark Oslo, Norway, agreement, the two sides will formally reopen negotiations aimed at producing a blueprint for a permanent peace accord by February and the deal itself by September. And early next month, in steps dictated by the recent agreement, Israel is due to release a second batch of 150 prisoners.

It was the issue of prisoners, emotion-charged for both sides, that delayed the latest accord for several days. Negotiators struggled to reconcile different perceptions of a shared history. Palestinians see the prisoners as patriots, soldiers who should be freed at the war's end; Israelis like Dov Kalmanovitz see them as violent criminals.

Kalmanovitz, a 42-year-old Israeli, bears disfiguring scars on his face and hands from burns he suffered when Palestinians tossed a Molotov cocktail into his car as he drove through the West Bank in January 1988. On Thursday, he came, alone, to the Ofer military checkpoint near Ramallah, where 50 prisoners were freed, to stage a personal protest.

"I don't think this [release] should go together with peace," Kalmanovitz said quietly. "Why are we forgiving these men? Israel made peace with Germany, but you don't forgive the Nazis."

After arduous negotiations, Israel opted to release only those prisoners who had injured Israelis or killed Palestinians suspected of collaborating with Israel. It did not free anyone who killed an Israeli, carried out operations since the beginning of the peace process in 1993, or belongs to a militant Islamic group still opposed to peace.

Just after sunrise, eight buses carrying the prisoners left two jails in the south of Israel, heading for checkpoints at the entrances to the Gaza Strip and Palestinian-controlled areas of the West Bank.

Ibrahim Fawzi Kurd, 30, of the Gaza town of Sheikh Radwan, had spent 11 years and four months in jail for carrying out bombings in Gaza and in Israel that wounded 10 Israelis.

"I am not ashamed of what I did. It was for my people and I am proud of it," said Kurd, whose son Ziad is a star on the Palestinians' fledgling soccer team. "They occupied my land, I didn't occupy theirs. But I do not repeat it now."

At the Jalazoun refugee camp near Ramallah, Hussein said he was a member of Fatah, the PLO faction led by Yasser Arafat, when he and several others planted explosives aimed at killing and wounding Israeli soldiers. Arrested in 1986, he served two-thirds of a 21-year sentence.

Now, though, "I'm ready to look at Israelis as neighbors and to live with them in coexistence, as long as I get my rights," he said. He defined those rights as Palestinian statehood and a comprehensive just peace.

Water treatment worthwhile

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Correspondent

On the bottom of Eastman Lane, away from the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus is a small, nondescript gray building beside a huge pile of coal. The black coal, burned at the University's Tilson power plant, is piled high and from recent rains, it glints rays of sunshine. A small red sign identifies the building as the Water Treatment Facility Building.

Besides the gray building is a deep concrete basin surrounded by a black chain-link fence, filled with ten feet of water that has come from the coal. When it rains, the water seeps through the cracks in the black mineral and through the heavy gauge plastic, the same kind used at landfills. It then forms a little stream that flows into a drain. That drain empties into the deep basin, the water pouring out black from the coal that it came through.

From there, the water goes into a several-million-dollar gray building and pours into Taylor Brook on the other side, completely transparent.

Jane Scelewicki has been working at UMass's Water Treatment facility for 14 years, and at the new facility for two. She proudly holds up a bottle of jet-black water for visitors and then, to compare the before and after, a bottle of totally clear.

"I had to learn this from scratch," said Scelewicki, the University's Water Treatment Supervisor. "We've lost help and jobs, but we still maintain everything on campus."

Maintenance includes watching over 20 air-conditioned buildings and 75 heated buildings.

Scelewicki's daily attention to her job, and her attention to the amount of water in the basin, can save the University as much as $25,000. If the black water poured into Taylor Brook, the University could be fined as much as $25,000 per day. Water collects in the basin at a rate of a foot per inch of rainwater.

"It had been at five feet since March 25," Scelewicki said. "But all the rain recently brought it up to ten feet, and it was at 11 feet [Wednesday] morning."

She proudly says that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has never fined her facilities, nor have they ever failed an inspection.

Scelewicki's responsibilities extend well beyond protecting Taylor Brook from runoff. She's responsible for treating all of the water from all air-conditioning and heating facilities to make it acceptable to re-enter the watershed.

"It's a really involved job for one person," Scelewicki said in response.

"That's true," he said, and as she laughed in the background, he added, "I don't how she did it."

According to Ross, a lot of people don't understand what he and Scelewicki do.

"A lot of people think that treating this water is like treating pools, or that we treat the drinking water, and it just isn't," Ross said. "We deal with AC and heating, but the reality is that water treatment is a forever job. Nobody doing this can miss a beat."

Treating the water can help to stop the spread of Legionnaires Disease, among others. Cleaning the water from the coal-burning itself, which Ross described as rare for a power plant, can be critical for maintenance of the environment.

Northampton mayor Ford talks some shop

KARA STOKES / COLLEGIAN

Mary Ford, the mayor of Northampton, speaks to new and returning public policy students.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

As Mayor of Northampton, Mary Ford deals with many issues both on the local and state levels of government. When she spoke to a group of Commonwealth College students at the University of Massachusetts on Tuesday, her message was clear: get involved.

Since 1982, when Ford was elected to office, she has been actively participating in creating public policy on the state and local levels. Ford said she never intended to enter politics, but decided upon it when she realized government wasn't doing anything to better society.

"I saw myself as an outsider," Ford said, "someone who wanted a certain quality of life in my community. I felt estranged by what public government was doing."

According to Ford, she wanted to be the person who "slices the pie" and decides what parts are allocated to division within a city.

She admits she didn't know much about public policy and public representatives. However, she said she knew that her influence in directing state government would be a positive one and that her participation would be a rewarding challenge.

"The job of mayor was more than I had imagined it would be and it was more fulfilling than I imagined it would be," Ford said.

On the local level, Ford has dealt extensively with the 1994 enactment of a smoking ban. The ban prohibited smoking in public places. The decision ignited reactions from public officials and residents. The Board of Health is now looking to expand the ban to include local bars.

Though Ford ventured to establish the smoking ban, she said that taking on the issue affected Northampton.

"I don't think every small town should be taking on the burden of trying to ban smoking," Ford said. "I would rather have the federal and state government take on smoking bans."

Stances on the issue are divided among Northampton residents.

Ford related finding her place in public office to the experience many college students also go through.

In college, Ford never imagined she would one day pursue a career in public policy. She encourages students to move around educational tracks and get to know what they're really interested in doing.

"The real world has been what's enabled me to be a mayor," Ford said. "I didn't go to school for what I do now."

Ford's message was that everything is connected and students should strive to get involved in many areas of their education—that is how she finally found her interest. It is a love for her job which brings her back to public government again and again.

Danforth promises probe

By David A. Vise and Lorraine Adams
Washington Post

WASHINGTON - Former Missouri Sen. John Danforth, appointed Thursday to probe the FBI's 1993 raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco, Texas, signaled immediately that he planned to wage an aggressive and independent investigation focusing on two "dark questions": Did the federal government kill people? And was there a cover-up?

Appearing at a news conference with Attorney General Janet Reno, Danforth said that he will have broad discretion to conduct the the investigation as he sees fit. Underlining Danforth's independence, Reno announced that she would take the unusual step of recusing herself from the probe, in which she expects to be called as a witness. Danforth will instead report to Deputy Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr.

Following weeks of questions about pyrotechnics, flares, and who-knew-what-when at the Justice Department, the stentorian Danforth brought a sense of decisiveness to the inquiry, which he intends to conduct from his home town of St. Louis. The 63-year-old ex-senator said he will use all the tools at his disposal, including a grand jury if necessary, to get at the truth.

President Clinton, speaking to reporters at the White House, applauded the selection of Danforth, calling him "an honorable man and an intelligent and straightforward man. The only thing I would ask is that he conduct a thorough and prompt investigation."

Danforth, who served in the Senate for 18 years and whose appointment has widespread support on Capitol Hill, said he is tackling the difficult task because of lingering uncertainty over what really happened during the April 1993 raid that left about 75 people dead, including numerous children. He said those events, and new revelations about the FBI's use of at least two potentially incendiary military tear gas rounds during the raid, have shaken the faith of the American people in the "integrity" of government.

The FBI and Justice Department have maintained that the tear gas cartridges, fired hours before the blaze that took the lives of the Branch Davidians and their leader, David Koresh, did not start the fire. But the revelation that such rounds were fired has prompted queries on Capitol Hill and elsewhere about whether other information might have been withheld.

"The first question is, 'Was there a cover-up?' And the second question is, 'Did federal officials kill people?'" Danforth said.

freds of East Timorese being marched at gunpoint out of the compound of Archbishop Carlos Belo, the 1996 Nobel peace laureate who fled the battered province to Australia earlier in the week. Many held their hands in the air and had panicked expressions.

The current wave of intense violence began Saturday with the announcement that nearly four-fifths of East Timorese voted for independence instead of autonomy within Indonesia — in a referendum. Indonesia invaded East Timor in 1975, beginning a frequently brutal occupation that is believed to have killed

200,000 people and has never been internationally recognized. Portugal, which had colonized East Timor, remains the official administrative power of the territory and has been in talks at the urging of calls for international

In Jakarta, Indonesian officials warned that international pressure might provoke an anti-Western backlash that could derail the independence vote and undermine Indonesia's fragile transition to democracy.

"The international community has to be very careful," said Dewi Fortuna Anwar, a foreign policy adviser and spokeswoman for President B.J. Habibie. "Do not go around bullying Indonesia." If Habibie were to agree to allow foreign troops in East Timor, as some nations are urging she said, "it might make his position more difficult here against this jingoistic nationalist backlash."

"If there is too much international pressure, you'll see the nationalist people saying we don't accept the results of the process." Anwar said. Indonesia's people assembly must still ratify the referendum result.

Foreign Minister Ali Alatas met Thursday with a high-level Security Council delegation that also saw Habibie and Gen. Wiranto, the armed forces commander. Alatas blamed "rogue elements" in the military for participating in the six days of bloodletting in Dili. The U.N. delegation will visit East Timor on Saturday.

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook, who is meeting with other foreign ministers in New Zealand before the opening of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, summed up the international dilemma concerning East Timor. After the overwhelming popular vote for independence, he said, "We're not going to allow their cry for freedom to be drowned in blood." But he also said

Indonesia's consent was needed for a peacekeeping force because "to go in without the consent of Indonesia would not be peacekeeping, it would be an invasion."

Indonesia is the world's fourth largest country and has a 400,000-man military.

Golden Oldies Summer: One guy's radio internship

My summer was filled with surprises. Like many college students throughout the country, I spent my three months off working for no money at all. Instead, I accepted university credits to do an internship.

Perhaps the most difficult part about doing an internship is deciding where you are going to go. As a communications major, there are many different places and options available, and all of them can expand your horizons to new limits. That's why I decided to be a male stripper at a dance club in Providence. Unfortunately, the guy who owned the strip club called me a fat, pathetic disgrace to manhood, so I had to settle for my second choice: radio.

When I walked into the offices of B101 (the oldies station) and WRX (classic rock) in Providence, I introduced myself, and was immediately greeted with, "Hi Ryan, you're a fat, pathetic disgrace to manhood." However, I was determined to do a job somewhere, and my options were getting limited, so I stuck with this one.

Now, if you think that as an intern at an extremely popular radio station means you can walk in and get a cool on-air name like "Rockin' Ryan," or my personal favorite, "DJ Ghetto Booty," you're wrong. In reality, an internship actually involves helping important people (getting DJs coffee) and doing the important jobs that really matter to people (such as dressing up in a bee costume and waving to drivers on the highway). However, what surprised me the most about working in a radio station is the stuff that you'd never know took place behind the scenes.

Just like pro-wrestling, everything is staged. All the contests are planned out months in advance, and in fact the only thing that isn't staged is the winner. That's the only surprise in the radio industry. You never know who is going to win the prize, but a lot of the time it's a professional prizewinner. I didn't realize these people existed either, but the truth is that they sit in their house and win prizes for a living!

If you don't come pick up your prize, I love you! This summer, I lived on free pizza, cereal, T-shirts and other radio charity that was all from people not picking up their prizes. It really makes me wonder what those people are thinking. I've never won anything in my life, except one dollar on a scratch ticket, and even then I got all excited and kissed the convenience store clerk. Why would someone not pick up a free weekend on Block Island with all expenses paid? That drives me nuts. (By the way, to the dude who didn't pick up his tickets, my weekend on Block Island was awesome.)

When you call in requesting something, if the DJ doesn't want to play it, it will never be on the air. Since I worked for an oldies station, about half of the call-ins were for old songs. The other half were 14 year old girls screaming, "Do you have 'Mumbop'?" Personally, I think this is an entire, separate attention span problem for which I blame the school systems for not teaching the difference between 1955 and 1995, but that's a whole other issue. One of the biggest songs of the summer was the Pearl Jam cover of "Last Kiss." I swear there were 15 calls a day for the original version recorded by some guy who is so important that I can't even remember his name.

Promotional events are extremely difficult to set up. Every week, I had to set up a promotional event in downtown Providence, and amid all of the reckless drivers, and this one homeless guy who would take porno magazines out of the trash and sell them for 2 bucks apiece (a hell of a bargain, might I add), I had to stay focused on the job at hand. Only after everything was done could I throw things at the reckless drivers and read my slightly tainted porn.

The most important thing I learned about the radio industry this summer was that women love men on the radio. I felt an overwhelming power when I walked around with my black WRX T-shirt on, while standing next to the radio station's van. Of course, the overwhelming power was completely taken away when some gorgeous girl I was hitting on shot me down with, "Why would I ever go out with you? You're a fat, pathetic disgrace to manhood."

So I'm up here, strolling on the campus from my home in Central to my classes, to my job at the Collegian, and to the various food centers that are around and I'm taking notice of something: a small little something that just nags and nags.

This campus has got to be the most absolutely cold, unfriendly and impolite place, while at the same time being the most accepting and supportive. Now, how on Earth a dichotomy like that creates itself, I'm not sure, but there are examples here to back me up.

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst has a club, a house or an office for every single person, every single interest, every single left-wing, right-wing or "central wing," and every single possible little ounce of diversity.

If you're gay, there's a place for you.

If you're straight, there's a place for you.

If you're a woman, ditto.

If you're a man, ditto.

If you're black, ditto.

If you're Asian, ditto.

In fact I'm fairly sure that if a Bolivian Christian interested in the Dental Arts came up here, he or she could find his niche and get a lot of support from the University community.

If a Canadian, gay, Jewish hockey player came down here, he too could find his niche, his little piece of the bigger pie.

If a Communist animal-lover from Thailand studying English with a minor in history needed a place to stay the night, I'm sure someone from one of those disciplines, or perhaps another person just like him or her, would offer that person a bed.

That is just amazing, because there surely aren't a lot of places around the United States where these kinds of things are going to fly. A lot of people don't want to ever have to put up with animal-lovers or the people at Mass RAH, or a lot of the other clubs that have popped up here. But this campus thumbs its collective nose at such things, brazenly being as accepting as is humanly possible.

However, in the same breath, that acceptance has simultaneously spawned an atmosphere of people just not being very nice to one another.

Men don't hold the door for women, and women, in turn, don't hold the door for men, and most importantly, nobody holds the door for anybody.

Strangers walking on campus don't turn to say hello to one another or give a smile, and only half-heartedly respond to someone who does say hi.

In all of this politically correctness, we're supposed to make everyone feel loved - don't. God forbid, offend anyone. At the same time, people walk in front of other people without even considering to use the polite words of excuse me.

A guy came in here the other day, into this office, to complain that something of his, something that he was a part of, was slammed in the now-paper, and that we weren't being sensitive enough. He complained that we had used a derogatory term to describe something of his, something that we should have respected more.

He also proceeded to walk in front of people, not say excuse me, and just generally not be very polite in all of his frustration. Now, maybe he was just an unhappy camper that his little piece of the pie was being attacked, but he wasn't doing much to earn the kind of respect he seemed to want.

He was expecting a certain amount of respect just for existing, but at the same time not returning it to anyone else. Humans are owed common courtesies, and common respects. If we had genuinely offended that man about something even remotely important, he was owed an apology, especially if he was going to be polite about it. But he just wanted his apology, he wanted what was owed him, and he didn't want to have to give a single thing back.

In fact, it seems that, on a personal level, everyone is so concerned with protecting their little corner of this university that they don't extend the most common of courtesies to anyone else, all the while expecting to be treated as the most thin-skinned individuals to walk the earth.

Don't dare insult what a person does up here, and don't dare expect that you will receive any kind of courtesy in return. In fact, don't expect courtesy, period.

This, of course, isn't a plague that has struck the entire campus, as for sure there are polite men and women who smile and say hello to passers-by, hold the door for people behind them, say their pleases and thank yous, and say excuse me should they cut in front of someone.

But the existing culture of expecting respect without showing any is problematic at best. It is a horrible display of the worst aspects of a politically correct atmosphere. This campus strives so hard to make everyone feel welcome that everyone feels they are owed something, and in response, they act as if they owe nothing. That just isn't the case.

People are owed an "excuse me" when someone cuts in front of them, people are owed a polite "hello" on a quiet night, and people are owed other such basic, simple common courtesies. They aren't owed such things because they are black or white or a Jewish Canadian hockey player. They're owed something because they're people.

Nice Guy Wanted

So, you think you have what it takes to be a nice guy, mmmm? Well, do you have the time, dedication, and sacrifice...? Wait.

You cringed at the word "sacrifice." What, did you think that being a nice guy would be an easy job, like flipping burgers? No, my friend, being a nice guy is tough work, more often than not leaving the idealist a very unhappy person.

Are you confused? Let me explain. For many of us, myself included, the offer of the nice guy role was very tempting. After all, nice guys only need to be happy and helpful all the time. Have you ever had this attitude? If you have, it is likely that you have what is known as the Nice-Guy Complex.

Let me elaborate. It is written in the Book of Boo that "he who loses himself in the name of social recognition will be lost in the eyes of those people served." Still confused? To put it bluntly, there are two kinds of people who are truly taken for granted. The first is the so-called "hot" guys and chicks. The second is, you guessed it, the nice guy.

While the nice guy is not another category that society deems necessary in its placement of stereotypes, the Nice-Guy Complex in itself is a social problem. While some of society's misfits pose a threat to others, the nice guy poses a significant threat to himself. Since others govern the nice guy's level of self-confidence, the nice guy becomes a social slave in order to feel good. He feels restricted in the things he says and does. He is desperately afraid that being non-conformist will alienate those he has tried so hard to win over. Lost? Let me tell you about a little test case named Robert.

Robert was an intelligent, motivated, but shy and sensitive guy. While others tried to win people over with bravado and sheer force, Robert tried the nice guy approach. He figured that by serving others, others would serve him back. In his spare time he planned wondrous deeds of goodwill. He made small acts of self-sacrifice daily. One day it was giving up his lunch money so that a classmate could have lunch. Another day he would miss the bus so that he could help a classmate clean out her locker. And while he got murmured thanks here and there, he still felt bound to do these little acts in order to be appreciated.

Even the large-scale acts of exaggerated kindness could only do so much. One Christmas, Robert sought to make a great impression. He sent all the girls in his class hand-crafted cards. The reaction was of surprise and gratitude. Robert got more hugs and smiles that day than he had in the past year. Finally, he realized, this was a stunt that could guarantee results!

Boo Downs

However, like a drug-induced high, the second time was not as good as the first time. Robert's escapades got more and more elaborate as his acts became less appreciated. By the next Christmas, even with the addition of personally chosen quotes, the Christmas card scheme only brought a few scattered thanks. Robert finally realized that he had fallen into the Nice-Guy Complex.

Have you ever fallen victim to the Nice-Guy Complex? You are addicted to shamelessly belittling yourself for others. You are frustrated beyond belief because you cannot understand why others seem to actually get credit for the things they do. You know your emotional stability is on the brink of destruction, but you don't know what to do.

Well, there are a few options people commonly face with this dilemma.

The first fate is often a continuation of the Nice-Guy Complex. The victim continues to meekly waste his life away, becoming increasingly withdrawn and depressed.

The second fate is a reversal of the Nice-Guy Complex. The person becomes angry and bitter, renouncing those who did not give him his due credit. He then becomes increasingly antisocial and unstable. Both of these fates are self-destructive, and many good people sadly fall into these clutches.

If you are a chronic nice guy, do not fear. There is a program designed for a safe withdrawal. However, like most addictions, it takes time, patience and a pained ego in order to escape from the Nice-Guy Complex. You can still help people, of course, but you must not do so at the expense of your own well-being. While this may initially sound selfish, it's a step you must take. Volunteer work is encouraged, but is not necessary. Daring to express your opinion is healthy, even though it may take a while to get used to defending your thoughts and actions. In the beginning, it may seem that points you make seem recycled and useless. With time and experience (and several blunders), you will finally be able to think on your own two feet. It won't be too long before people begin to respect you for your positions. From there, the people who viewed you with amusement and pity will look at you with eyes of admiration. Thus years of personal torture can finally mature into years of personal satisfaction.

Being a nice guy is not worth the trouble you inflict upon yourself. However, being a mature nice guy will bring you the pleasures that life has to offer. From one nice guy to another, you must be nice to yourself before you can afford to be nice to other people. Then, and only then, can you become a credit-grabbing megalomaniac.

Guster, Erelli welcome students back tonight!

Guster: Found and here forever

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

Fascinating live performances teamed with a distinct sound have put Guster on the cusp of becoming a major music industry mainstream breakthrough with staying power. The trio is Boston's newest party band and the latest addition to the respectful lineage of influential Boston legends like Aerosmith, Boston, the J. Geils Band, the Cars, and the Pixies.

Continuously voted "Best Live Act" at the Boston Music Awards, Guster brought their infectious and addictive sound to the masses as part of Woodstock '99 and a packed hometown crowd at the WFNX Hatch Shell last summer, they were a headliner for the west coast dates of the H.O.R.D.E. tour, along with performing alongside Widespread Panic, the Barenaked Ladies, and Semisonic.

However, this is just the beginning, as their cross-platform melodies stir the hearts of not only the loyal followers of jam bands and boards of college students, but mainstream audiences as well. A different sound with a similar niche market, Boston's Guster is the perfect answer to what the world may be seeking - a replacement for Dave Matthews. Just two guitarists and a percussionist who drums by hand, a complete rarity in music, manufactures the band's rich, vibrant sound. A product of Tufts University seven years ago when the band met during freshmen orientation week, they quickly built a solid fan base throughout the Boston area.

The band's potent major label debut, Lost and Gone Forever, captures the essence of Guster's rich harmonies and intelligent utilization of simple musical equipment to form a new, and exhilaresh Gupter, sound. The stimulating album is a refreshing listen in the present climate of the music world.

With an album that will soon be found and here forever, Guster finds its mark among music elite. The lead single "Barrel of a Gun" has just started its climb on the charts, while "Center of Attention" captures fans' curiosities.

Guster also demonstrates loyalty to its fan base on the album by allowing six lucky fans to come in the studio and whistle on the track, entitled "All The Way Up To Heaven." They followed this uncharacteristic move on a major label debut with a whistling crew of local bar patrons on "Fa La."

Watch out, as there is little in the way to impede this act's rise to national prominence. It's fair to assume that Guster will be headlining a shed tour either this coming summer or next.

Guster plays the Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton tonight. Jump Little Chicken opens the show at 7pm. Tickets may be purchased in advance at Vor the Record in Amherst, the Northampton Box Office, or by calling 1-800-THE-TICK. Tickets are also available at the door.

Erelli to captivate Iron Horse

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

After hearing hundreds of demos from aspiring musicians one will emerge and his name is Mark Erelli. Erelli is that rare individual whose captivating sound forces the listener to wonder why they have never heard of him. His rare style makes members of the privileged music industry loop question if they are even still in it, but indeed they are. it is just that listeners of Erelli are at the forefront of a significant musical discovery. Erelli's cutting voice, sharp guitar playing and excellent songwriting assures that he is indeed for real.

Being discovered at a 2:30am music industry showcase, Erelli was a real "sleeper" in the business. After signing with Signature Sounds and releasing a debut, I relli is quickly and quietly gaining acclaim throughout North America. His boost in popularity can be attributed to recently winning the Kerrville Folk Festival just a few months ago, that in the past 25 years has helped to launch the careers of Nanci Griffith, Lyle Lovett, and John Gorka among many others. Appearances at festivals like Telluride Bluegrass, Rocky Mountain Folks, along with Falcon Ridge have opened the public's ears to Erelli's sparkling sound.

Let's also not forget that Erelli was the performer who was given an encore opening for the Pat McGee Band last year in Northampton. Pat McGee was so taken aback by his abilities that he invited Mark to join the band for performances on several dates at some of the most prestigious clubs in the eastern part of the country.

The list of Erelli's backing musicians on the inside cover of his self-titled debut contains storied northeast names like Duke Levine (of the Mary-Chapin Carpenter band), Paula Cole guitarist Kevin Barry, and Susan Tedeschi bassist Jim Lamond. But there is no confusion that this is Erelli's recording.

His songs take the best that artists like John Hiat, Steve Earle, Bob Dylan and Bill Morrissey have to offer and is well-represented on his remarkable debut. From the rich opening track "Do It Everyday," to the simple sounds of "Thought I Heard You Knocking," and the lively presence felt on "Hollow Man" and "Midnight Train," I relli is quickly establishing himself as the pioneer of the next generation of folk.

Mark Erelli plays the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton tonight. Ben Demerath opens the show at 7pm. Tickets may be purchased in advance at Vor the Record in Amherst, the Northampton Box Office, or by calling 1-800-THE-TICK. Tickets are also available at the door.

The last time Guster performed in the area was nearly two years ago when they packed the Student Union Ballroom. Expect a sold-out stunning performance at the smaller Pearl Street tonight.

There will be a Mandatory all staff meeting on Wednesday, September 15, at 7 pm.

Lola runs at dizzying pace

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

RUN LOLA RUN
Directed by Tom Tykwer
With Franka Potente, Morite Bleibtreu, Herbert Kraup
Playing at Pleasant Street Theater

Wait. Give me a second. Let me catch my breath. I just spent 80 minutes chasing after some punk chick named Lola. And I was having fun the whole time.

Run Lola Run, a German import brought to us by Sony Pictures Classics, is the story of the same thing happening three different times and in three different ways. The film is carefully structured; it's easy to see the patterns developing, set chaotic at the same time.

(Warning: plot summary. Skip to the last paragraph if you don't want to know.) The story centers around two people, Manni (Morite Bleibtreu) and Lola (Franka Potente). Manni is a small-time lapdog for a big-time gangster. Acting as a courier for his employer, he takes part in a transaction worth 100,000 marks (about $54,000 U.S., for those unfamiliar with the exchange rate). His girlfriend, Lola, is supposed to pick him up, but her moped is stolen earlier in the day. Manni decides to take a train, but in a moment of absent-minded panic, leaves the money on the subway car with a homeless vagrant. Frantic, Manni calls Lola at home from the drop-off spot. His boss is about to show up, and without the money Manni is as good as dead.

Lola rushes out of her house. She has 20 minutes to get to Manni and, hopefully, pick up 100 grand along the way. With such a life-or-death-conflict, and so little time to solve it, it doesn't make for a very long movie. So, when the time is up and we end with a not-so-satisfying ending, we start back from the point that Lola left her house. Each time we get to see how the slightest change vastly affects the outcome. Lola tries in various ways to ask her wealthy, philandering father for the money, robbery is considered/attempted and, as desperation takes hold, a casino is visited.

The story also goes off on tangents about the people Lola encounters en route, only to jolt us back into the world of Lola and Manni. The result is a sort of cinematic whiplash. Thankfully we are given flashbacks of interaction between Lola and Manni strategically inserted between each new attempt to help Manni. These bedroom scenes serve two purposes: one, to let us recover, maybe take a breather, and two, to further develop the main characters.

One would think that each time the journey is replayed the adrenaline level would diminish. Not the case. Although we think we know what is going to happen next, the film lets us know that in truth we really don't.

The overall effect of the film is dizzying. The photography is excellent, not so much in terms of composition, but movement. The camera is constantly moving, seldom giving us a still frame. When we do have a stationary shot, we are not allowed to look at it for more than a few seconds. The film is edited to the tune of pulsing techno beats. An image is shown and vanishes from the screen as soon as it appears. It is the editing and cinematography that give the film the hectic feel that it requires.

One of the most inventive films in current release, Run Lola Run, is a delight. Both suspenseful and funny, make it a point to catch Lola before she runs out of the valley. Hurry, the girl is quick. A-

THE ASTRONAUT'S WIFE
Directed by Rand Ravich
With Johnny Depp and Charlize Theron
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

What do you get when you combine bland, unoriginal science fiction ideas with forgettable acting and a transparent, unresolved script? You get The Astronaut's Wife, a movie that plays like a bad Star Trek re-run, only without the entertaining hokiness and sense of humor.

Johnny Depp stars as Spencer Armacost, an astronaut caught in a terrible and mysterious malfunction while performing repairs outside his space shuttle. He returns, survives his injuries, and settles down to a more normal life with his lovely and devoted wife Jilian (Charlize Theron). Jilian begins to notice subtle changes in her husband's behavior, however, and soon suspects that something happened during the ill-fated mission of a more profound and hideous nature than anyone had previously suspected.

As Spencer, Depp is completely wooden. Personally, I couldn't tell the difference between the pre- and post-accident astronaut; both are equally and boringly inhuman. Theron gives a decent performance as the devoted but terrified wife, but she can't be expected to compensate for Depp's lack of inspiration and the movie's general lameness.

Writer/director Rand Ravich's screenplay, although technically not an adaptation of another work, draws upon science fiction themes so clichéd and overdone that never during the movie did any plot development surprise me. What's that? Spencer may be the host to a hostile alien entity? Get right out of town!

Adding to the audience's pain is the ponderously slow rate with which the movie unfolds, tearing through the story with all the momentum of a broken-down moped. Perhaps if Ravich had understood that everyone already knew Spencer had been infected (it was in the trailers, after all!), the script could have moved on and entertained us with the details of the forthcoming alien invasion. That portion of the plot, however, was woefully underdeveloped, giving us only a few, pointless glimpses into the minds of the alien invaders. The vast majority of the movie has us watching the idea slowly creep its way into Jilian's mind that her husband is not himself anymore, and since we knew this before the movie even began, boredom sets in fast and refuses to let go.

The Astronaut's Wife is one of the most forgettable pieces of science fiction storytelling to come our way in a long time, and in a genre drowning in its own clichés, nothing kills a movie's appeal faster than a failure to innovate. D-

Porn industry swells; L.A. no market for morality

By Jeffrey Gettleman
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES - While Hollywood is fretting about a downturn in production and the flight of jobs to cheaper markets such as Canada and Australia, a certain niche of the entertainment world is quietly flourishing: porn.

This summer, grips, gaffers and best boys of mainstream movie-making are marching down Hollywood Boulevard in an effort to save their jobs. But in the San Fernando Valley area of Los Angeles, where the bulk of the world's adult films are made, stagehands willing to stretch a boom over a couple in bed have no problem finding work.

It's not an industry that civic leaders embrace, and many people find pornography morally offensive. But the Valley's adult film business plays an increasingly large role in the region's economy and is having its most prosperous year ever, indicators show.

While feature-film shooting in Los Angeles County has decreased 13 percent this year, adult movie production is up 25 percent and increasing, according to the Los Angeles County Economic Development Corp.

In July, one out of five shoots was a porn film, even though these productions cost just a fraction of a Hollywood release, according to the Entertainment Industry Development Corp., which oversees the granting of film permits in the area.

And though major studios are trimming the number of features they produce annually, adult video producers are stepping up production. This year, the industry is on track to release 10,000 new titles, according to trade publication Adult Video News, up from 8,950 last year - an X-rated milestone that probably won't make it into the mainstream trade magazines.

Powered by the explosive growth of the Internet and shifting social mores, the San Fernando Valley's $4-billion porn industry has proved seemingly impervious to the bean-counting, cost-cutting culture seeping into Hollywood.

"You may not approve of the product, but the adult film industry is an amazingly large business," said Jack Kyser, chief economist of the Economic Development Corp. Given the distress in the entertainment industry, the success of the adult segment is a welcome anchor in the wind."

A crasser, darker side of Hollywood, the adult film industry makes its staggering sums quenching lust - often with youth. There's no getting around the fact that porn is a business that transforms apple-cheeked young women, many only one or two years out of high school, into buxom sex workers. It's a business with little oversight, no unions and serious health and safety risks.

Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan wishes the industry was headquartered somewhere else. Although he may not be planning a war on adult businesses like his counterpart Rudy Guiliani waged in New York, he is "ashamed" of the porn industry, he said.

It's a black eye on our city," Riordan said.

Many religious leaders, feminists and social conservatives condemn the industry in even stronger terms.

"The success of pornography is a reflection of the deterioration of American culture," said Art Croney, a lobbyist for the socially conservative Committee on Moral Concerns in Sacramento.

But porn is entrenched here for a reason. Close to Hollywood, the Valley's adult video industry benefits from the hushpuds of young starlets coming to town, the entertainment infrastructure and the easy morals of the region.

"Why would we want to leave?" asked Greg Alves, vice president of hard-core producer Metro Global Media Inc. in Van Nuys. "If I need something printed, I can go to a printer and they'll do it - no questions asked. If I go just 50 miles from here, they'll say, 'Hey, I don't do that.'"

Home to the world's largest community of porn stars (around 1,6000 and 50 of the 85 top porn companies, the Valley has earned the nicknames Silicone Valley and Valley of Sin. Though nobody knows exactly how many local jobs porn creates, economist Kyser estimates the number between 10,000 and 20,000.

UMass football begins its defense

UNH comes to McGuirk with experience but not Azumah

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

For each of the last four years, New Hampshire tailback Jerry Azumah torpedoed the Massachusetts football team. When the Atlantic 10 foes took the field for their annual game, as they will again this Saturday at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium at noon, the Wildcat runner would dominate, winning the Bill Knight Trophy as the game's Most Valuable Player as a freshman, sophomore and junior, leading the Navy Blue to three straight victories.

Even in 1998, the year that UMass would go on to win the Division I-AA National Championship, Azumah dominated, running for 241 yards and four touchdowns.

However, in Azumah's senior year, there would be a passing of the torch. The Minutemen survived a Wildcat rally to win 27-26 behind sophomore Marcel Shipp, who, with 185 yards and two scores of his own, staked his claim on the honor of being the top running back in the conference. Shipp took the Bill Knight Trophy and went on to rack up over 2,300 yards on the year.

Now, with Azumah fighting for a spot as a corner for the Chicago Bears in the NFL, Shipp, who UMass Coach Mark Whipple claims is 10 pounds heavier and even faster than before, enters the game as the premier back on the field in a game where the Most Valuable Player has been a running back in five of the last six years.

"I'll play the same whether Azumah's there or not," Shipp said. "He's a great player and there are a lot of comparisons (between us). I'm just looking to get the win, no matter who's the MVP ... as long as it's somebody that's wearing my color jersey."

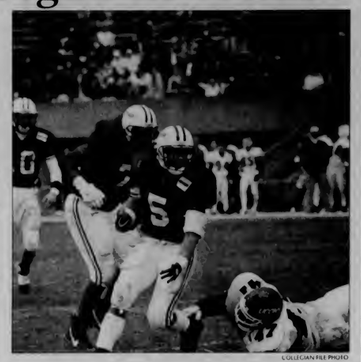
PREVIEW

Unbeknownst to the casual fan, the bragging rights enjoyed by being the best runner on the field for the UMass-UNH game might not be handed to Shipp without a fight.



In an opening game 37-14 clobbering of Rhode Island, Wildcat senior tailback Dan Curran snatched up A-10 Offensive Player of the Week honors by rushing for 167 yards and three touchdowns.

"It's great not to have to go against (Azumah) again, but the tailback they have, I saw that he did a great job last week," Minuteman quarterback Todd Bankhead said. "I think as a whole their offense will do a lot better, maybe because they don't have him, they have to do more things."

With the Rhody win behind them, New Hampshire will at least bring a game's experience into McGuirk when the UMass season kicks off.

"They are a week ahead of us," said UM wildcout Adrian Zullo. "They know where they stand, and they know what they have to fix. We've only been playing against ourselves and that's it, so I don't know if it's going to hurt us. I feel that we're going to be faster out there. We're just ready to go. There are no nicks and bruises on us now."

The anticipated Bankhead-Zullo connection, wherein the single-season record-holding quarterback in passing yards, completions, attempts and touchdowns will be throwing to the reigning A-10 Rookie of the Year, might also run into turbulence in the form of UNH cornerback Mike Szweda and the Wildcat defensive backfield. To make life more difficult for the champs, New Hampshire boasts a solid linebacking crew that features sophomore Jon Oosterhuis, who tallied 12 tackles and a sack against the Rams.

Marcel Shipp returns as the conference's top running back, compiling 2,542 yards in last year's run to the national championship.

"They've got a real experienced secondary," Bankhead said. "All four of their secondary guys are back. The linebackers are good athletes, obviously. Oosterhuis had a great game last week... What they do is play disciplined football. They don't give up a lot of big plays. We're just going to try and wear them down and do our thing."

Keeping up with the Minutemen will be no easy task, though. Shipp, Zullo and Bankhead will be aided by a couple of sleepers in the skill positions. Replacing seniors Matt Jordan and Kerry Taylor at the fullback and tight end positions will be Pete Carrello and Shaun Higgins. Taylor was named an All-American after his prolific senior season.

"I feel pretty comfortable about (replacing Kerry), to be honest," Higgins said. "I'm not going to be able to fill the same shoes as him blocking wise, but I think I bring a different asset to the game as far as receiving goes. I'm a little faster, and I used to be a wide receiver before I was a tight end."

Tracking Curran will be a quick group of Minutemen led by junior linebacker Kole Ayi, a preseason first-team All-American according to The Sports Network. With 1616 unassisted tackles last season, Ayi set the school single-season mark. Under pressure against Georgia Southern in the National Championship game, No. 50 made 16

UM soccer splits four on bumpy road

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

While most students were enjoying the end to their summer vacations, the Massachusetts men's soccer team was enduring a rough beginning to their 1999 season. After a difficult start the UMass team (2-2) has rebounded with two straight victories to even their record.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Fred Kinateder

The University of New Hampshire dashed the hopes of an opening day win when they claimed the season opener over the visiting Minutemen 1-0 on a first half goal that found its way past UMass goalie Todd Fowler. UNH's keeper notched a shutout, stopping all five UMass shots.

Massachusetts next traveled south to Florida to take on No. 20 Jacksonville in the opening round of the Nike/IU Legends Tournament. The Dolphins tallied twice in the first half and once in the second to jump out to a 3-0 lead. The Minutemen found the back of the net for their first goal of the 1999 season when senior midfielder Todd Baron connected on a penalty kick in the 89th minute. The loss dropped UMass to 0-2 on the young season.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Adam Black

The bumpy road continued for the Minutemen when they matched up against Georgia State in the second round of the Legends Tournament. Georgia State, like UNH and Jacksonville before them, capitalized in the opening frame. The Panthers surprised the UMass out of the gate and before eleven minutes had ticked off the clock the maroon and white had given up two goals.

With the way the early season had been going offensively, the two-goal lead was an uphill climb for the Massachusetts squad. In their first two matches they had combined for only one goal. The offense, however, responded by scoring two first half goals and adding four more in the second half to blow out Georgia State 6-2 for the first victory of the year.

Just before halftime junior Matt Christy cut the Panthers' lead in half off an assist from Fred Kinateder. Kinateder added a goal to his assist when he scored unassisted less than a minute later to knot the game at two before halftime.

Freshman Jeff Deren gave UMass its first lead of the 1999 season when he found the back of the net at 71:49 of the contest. The Minutemen displayed their quick-strike capabilities again as they exploded for three more goals in the final 10 minutes to seal the victory. Senior forward Adam Black scored twice for the Minutemen and Jon Burr added his first of the year to power the Minutemen.

The offensive explosion in the second half gave the UMass team the edge in goal differential for the tournament, earning the Minutemen a second place finish overall. Three Massachusetts players were selected to the all tournament team. Forwards John Lytton and Seth Lilburn and defenseman J.R. Pouncey earned the distinction as determined by the coaches of the four teams.

This Tuesday, the Minutemen returned to action against Hartford. The defensive effort that blanked Georgia State in the second half carried over into the Hartford game as UMass limited Hartford to just 10 shots and no goals behind Brian O'Quinn's goaltending. The team did not give up an early goal, a mistake that had plagued the team through the first three games.

UMass, however, could not tally a goal of their own in the ninety-minute regulation and it took sudden death overtime to decide the match. The game was settled early in overtime when Todd Baron finally found a way past Hartford's Chris Doyle to even the Minutemen's record at 2-2.

UMass returns to action this Friday night when they face the University of Maine at 7 p.m. at Chicopee's Szot Park field.

UMass prepared to host Classic; Briana Scurry to be honored today

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

There will be plenty of action at Totman Field this weekend when the Massachusetts women's soccer team hosts the two-day UMass Classic.

Besides the fact that three quality programs from around the nation will converge upon Amherst, the Minutewomen will also honor one of their own this afternoon. Former UMass goalkeeper Briana Scurry, a current standout for the U.S. National team and one of the heroes of the 1999 Women's World Cup, will be recognized at the match between her alma mater and Alabama-Birmingham.

"I think that it's great [all of the festivities and plans for the weekend to honor Scurry], and it's wonderful for the team too because they get to see one of their own who has graduated," Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "I've been trying to make this happen for two years now. It's great having Briana back because we're so damn proud of her."

Scurry will be the honorary captain for today's game and will also sign autographs following the contest.

On the field, however, Texas Christian University and Harvard will join UMass and UAB in the Classic. The event will give two of the top programs in New England the chance to face two up-and-coming southern schools.

"They [the Southern teams] wanted to come. Most schools have open dates in September before their conference play begins in October," Rudy said. "And it gives them the chance to go out of region, which is important too."

Katelyn Jones and the UMass women's soccer team host the UMass Classic beginning today when the Minutewomen take on Alabama-Birmingham at 4:30 p.m.

TCU (3-1) will face Harvard (0-0) in the first game on Friday afternoon at 2 p.m. before UMass (1-0-1) battles UAB (1-3) 30 minutes after the conclusion of the first game.

"Alabama plays like they think they are Brazil, I'm serious, possession is short and they like to build it up, and they have a quality keeper in Jen Brah," Rudy said. "They've played some decent sides so far and have played four games already, while we've only played two."

The host Minutewomen are led by senior forward Emma Kurowski, who enters the weekend with four points shy of the school record for points in a career. The record is currently held by Kurowski has posted three goals in her first two games to also pace the squad with six points.

Rebecca Myers Sophomore midfielder Sarah Cook is right behind Kurowski on the stat sheet through the first two games. The Cincinnati native has two goals and an assist for UMass in the early going. Other top scorers for the Minutewomen include junior forward Kara Green [four points] and sophomore Katelyn Jones [three points].

Either senior Angie Napoli or sophomore Cori Stevens will play in between the pipes this weekend. Both keepers played well in their lone starts of the season, Napoli pitched a shutout against Albany in the season opener, while Stevens made 21 saves in a 2-2 stalemate with Syracuse.

TCU comes into the weekend with a 2-0 loss to Baylor fresh on its mind. The Horned Frogs are 3-1 thus far, as they defeated Houston [1-0], Southwest Texas State [4-0] and Louisiana State [7-0].

"TCU is off to a good start. They lost to Baylor, who is nationally ranked, but beat LSU 7-0, which is really an unexpected score," Rudy said. "They've gotten a lot of goals from a lot of different directions, so it should be very, very interesting."

Leading scorers for TCU include Jenn Coulson [seven points], Sherry Dick [six points] and Allison Calleri [six points].

UM set to face Terps

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

There are a lot of things to like about the Massachusetts field hockey team. Unless, of course, you're the opposition.

With 6-foot back Anke Bruemmer and 5'10" midfielder Lucy Koch stalking the turf, they can beat you with pure size. With fleet-footed forwards Kristen Schmidt and Tamra Geryk blazing down the field, they can beat you with raw speed.

So what happens when the opposition consists of a bunch of turtles?

That's precisely the question that will be answered on Sunday, when the Lady Terrapins of Maryland invade Richard F. Garber field in an attempt to ground the high-flying Minutewomen. The Terps will be playing their second road game in three days, after taking on Boston College today.

Not that these turtles are to be taken lightly, by any means. Maryland entered the '99 season ranked No.1 in the nation according to Sports Illustrated, and proceeded to shutout their first two opponents in convincing fashion. In fact, the Terps thrashed American University 6-0 on August 31st without allowing a single shot or penalty corner.

It took a 5-3 loss to No.2 Old Dominion on September 6th to cool off the red-hot Terps, which may give Maryland an added spark on their northern road swing. Last season, the Terps rocked UMass 5-0 at College Park.

This year's Maroon and White stars are sure to have more fight in them, however. The Minutewomen are coming off an emotional 1-0 shutout of regional rival Boston College on Wednesday, a contest which saw ferocious defense and exceptional ball control from the

N.E. water polo poses challenges

By Matthew Bencal
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's water polo team is working towards another winning season, and their quest continues this weekend. After finishing with three victories and one loss last weekend at the Navy Invitational, the Minutemen host their only home tournament of the season at Amherst College. This weekend's Collegiate Water Polo Association league tournament features the Minutemen being opposed by Harvard (11:30 am), Boston College (2:30 pm) and Brown (7:00 pm) on Saturday, and by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology on Sunday at 10:30 am.

Head Coach Russ Yarworth is seeking another strong showing from his senior co-captains Richard Huntley and Cory Koenemann. Huntley, an All-American goalie, had 248 saves in 110 quarters last season. His 22 saves in the four games last weekend were key to the team's success. Koenemann looks to improve on strong numbers from last season. Along with twenty-five goals, he had five blocks and thirty steals. At the Navy Invite, Koenemann led the attack in a 9-6 victory over George Washington, netting three of his four goals on the weekend.

Senior leadership will be a key factor to success, and this year's squad is very lucky in that respect. Seniors Timmy Troupis and Rich Slingluff are being relied upon to lead the offensive attack, and both have a wealth of experience. Troupis is the top-returning scorer from last season with eighty-one points. Slingluff led the team last season with successful swim-offs (18) and shooting percentage (.518). Slingluff and Troupis showcased their abilities last weekend with seven goals each including three apiece in the Minutemen's 15-1 romp over the U.S. Naval Academy "B" squad.

With the loss of Brian Stahl, the UMass water polo all-time leading scorer, Coach Yarworth had to devise a way to make up for the loss. Yarworth has spoken of a more diverse offense this season, especially at the two-meter position. Sophomore Greg Traver is being looked upon to fill the gap. Traver had seventeen goals in his freshman season, and got off to a hot start with four goals at the Navy Invite. Koenemann, junior Brook O'Neill, and sophomore Adam Moore will also receive time at the position. O'Neill has already logged in over 200 quarters of collegiate playing time, featuring 20 goals, seven blocks and 26 steals. Moore, a transfer from USC, scored twice last weekend and is noted for his size and strong defensive play.

Last season, the Minutemen had great success against in their upcoming opponents. The 1998 CWPA tournament at Cambridge, Massachusetts consisted of Fordham, M.I.T., and Harvard. In a single day's work, UMass dominated the tournament, defeating Fordham, M.I.T. and Harvard by the combined score of 52-9. The Minutemen also defeated Boston College two weeks later by a score of 18-2.

UMass women. Key contributions have come from almost everyone on Coach Patty Shea's roster, including a number of outstanding underclassmen.

German native Bruemmer, who led the team in scoring last season as a freshman, has emerged as the team's premier penalty corner threat as well as a tenacious defender. Sophomore forward Kaitlyn Byron has given opposing defenses fits all season, while fellow second-year standout Kerry Ann Jaggassar has brought boundless grit and athleticism to the UM backfield.

While the Maroon and White's younger stars have stepped up in '99, the team's veterans have also cranked it up and provided the best of leadership both on and off the field. Seniors Chrissy Millhauer, Nicole Bardell, and co-captain Michelle Crooks have used their years of collective hockey experience to elevate the entire team's level of play. Co-captain Koch leads a group of no less than six third-year superstars, including Schmidt, defensive specialist Patty Robinson, and phenomenal goalkeeper Zowie Tucker.

The Terps will counter the formidable UMass roster with a few stars of their own, most notably junior Carla Tagliente. Tagliente needs just four assists to move into 10th place on the school's all-time list, and the New York native has already cracked the Terp-top-ten in goals and assists. Sophomore Caroline Walter leads the team in scoring with six goals and 13 points thus far in '99, while Massachusetts native Dina Rizzo (Walpole H.S.) has provided furious defense for Maryland.

The Minutewomen will follow up the Maryland showdown and wrap up their five-straight home game opener when they face James Madison at Garber Field next Saturday. They will then hit the road for tough away contests at North Carolina and Duke on September 25th and 26th, respectively.

Women's X-country revs up for '99

By Bryan Smith

This weekend, when the Massachusetts women's cross country team travels to Boston, they will be starting the quest for an unprecedented 5th straight Atlantic 10 championship.

Julie LaFreniere

UMass has a strong nucleus to back this season and the experience should propel them back to the top. The Minutewomen will have to be ready when they take to roads of Franklin Park for a quad meet with regional rivals Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Boston College.

Coach Julie LaFreniere has one of the deepest squads that UMass has ever fielded. This is hard to say when a team is going for its 5th straight crown. The road is going to be tough, but it seems as though LaFreniere's squad will be up to the challenge that lies ahead of them.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Sally Hirsch

Returning for the Minutewomen are senior tri-captains Sally Hirsch, Sharon Tillotson, and Nicole Way. Both Hirsch and Tillotson have earned all-conference honors the last two seasons while Way is returning for a fifth season after placing in the top five in every race.

Complementing the trio will be junior Melissa Henderson, arguably the Minutewomen's most consistent force last season. Henderson placed second or third in five of six races in 1998 and looks to improve upon that figure.

To go along with the stellar senior class the distance squad also returns the A-10 individual champion in Kristen Ciswoski. A walk-on to the team last season, she was the first freshman ever to accomplish the feat.

"She had a super freshman year and now she just needs to do what she's capable of doing," coach Julie LaFreniere said of the N.H. native.

Senior Lizzie Sheptick is coming off of a solid spring season and will be looked upon to provide a spark this year. Also returning are sophomores Sarah Thoms and Katherine Blais who are coming off fantastic freshman campaigns.

"We've got a highly motivated group coming back. They compete with a lot of heart and guts," she said. "It's all a matter of how badly we want it," said LaFreniere.

A strong showing against regional rivals would set the tone for the whole season. With the crop coming back, the Minutewomen should have no problem coming together as a team.

In his 33rd season at the helm of the men's cross-country team, Ken O'Brien leads his troops into action in a five-team meet in Boston.

Boston opener for Cross country team

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Correspondent

NCAA Track and Field Coach of the Year Ken O'Brien will be taking the UMass men's cross country team to Franklin Park in Boston tomorrow at 4 p.m. to face rivals B.C., UConn, Iona, and N.H. for their season opener.

This season expectations are high that the Minutemen will break last year's records, as they have been chosen to finish fourth in the conference according to the coach's poll (they finished fifth last year).

Leading this year's team will be seniors Matt Ely, Sean Murphy, and last years top performer, team captain Kevin Somers. Somers placed 19th in the Atlantic-10 Championships and Ely had two top-ten finishes and finished 38th in the Atlantic-10 finals. However, coach O'Brien expects that Ely may be the top performer this season due to his rigorous summer training, and that Sean Murphy will lead a very promising group of younger runners in the sophomore class.

In addition to their talented upper-classmen, they are counting on the talents of sophomore Kevin Curtin who was honored as the Atlantic-10 rookie of the year last year, an award that is given to the most outstanding freshman. Hopes are high that the Minutemen will be back on top this season with the aid of their experienced seniors and the returning eight letter-winners from last year's squad.

But despite all of the promising talent that the team has, in tomorrow's game, coach O'Brien favors top-ten ranked Iona to walk away with the win. This will be followed in second place by B.C., whom he favors because they'll be playing on their home course and more importantly because they already have had one meet under their belt which O'Brien feels will be enough to throw them over the top in the battle for second place. The Minutemen lost to top-ten ranked Iona last season, a team coach O'Brien acknowledges are a "tough opponent for anyone".

The Minutemen began their pre-season training on their own in June, but have had only one formal practice, which was on Wednesday. In essence, there will have been only 48-hours between their first formal practice and their first meet. O'Brien anticipates that starting late may contribute to them experiencing difficulty in the first few meets but also emphasizes that runners are able to cover a lot of ground training on their own and that they will get in stride and be competing for the championship by the second half of the season.

"It's always exciting to get the season started. It's exciting to go to the first meet to see how much progre s has been made because it's an opportunity for us to plot our actions for the rest of the season," O'Brien said.

The Minutemen's next meet will take place on September 18th at Vermont with B.U. and Maine, followed by The Meet of Champions at the Bronx, N.Y. on October 2nd.

Dixon, UMass women's tennis stares tough Atlantic 10 conference straight in the eye

Matt Seifert
Collegian Correspondent

This is the weekend that most of us will find refuge on our couches in anticipation of the new National Football League season. However, watching football is not on the docket for the Massachusetts women's tennis team who will be doing anything but sitting this weekend as they venture down to Syracuse, New York to kick-off their new season.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Robyn Lebovitz

Syracuse is home of the Sunity Life Tennis Classic this weekend and will be an early challenge to the Minutewomen. Many consider the tournament one of the top tournaments in women's college tennis. Among those competing are top programs such as Boston University, Cornell, Marshall, Providence, Rutgers, Syracuse, and Temple. The tournament consists of six singles flights and three doubles.

Competition will be fierce in this year's Sunity Life Classic, Syracuse, which will be hosting the event, has six returning players from last season's squad that captured third-place honors at the 1999 BIG EAST Championship. Also A-10 rival Temple will have their big-name star Tamara Truta returning this year. Truta, a junior, is coming off of a stellar year in which she went 24-12 in singles play while leading the Owls to second in the conference. Truta was also named to the A-10 All-Championship team last year.

But last year is old news, and we live in a "what have you done for me lately?" society. If you have the idea that the Minutewomen are pushovers, nothing could be farther from the truth. They are coming off a campaign in which the finished 16-9, while finishing third in their conference. Coach Judy Dixon sees the tournament as a unique opportunity.

"The reasons they have these tournaments is so the coaches can see where their players stand at this point in the season, this will be the one time this year where I will just sit back and observe," Dixon said. "The best players in the East are invited to this tournament, and we certainly deserve to be in the mix."

The Minutewoman are a strong team that is looking to get stronger this season. They have five letterwinners returning for this season to team with three freshmen. Senior Ola Gerasimova returns this year after posting a 19-14 singles record last year. Like a pro free agent, the 6ft0in from Russia will be looking to make a strong impression in her final year.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Annie Hamilton

Newcomer Annie Hamilton will be a part of the thi rd class Elizabeth Ebert, Lauren Perrs and Kathryn Stammen are highly touted out of high school. The fact that they have graduated from their respective high school is more than a cause for celebration for their high school opponents whom they leveled during their high school days. Ebert was a Westford Academy star and Lowell Sun All-Star during her senior year. Perry racked up a .650 win percentage her four years at Silver Lake Regional H.S. To top it all off, there's Stammen, who Dixon suspects will play immediately. The projected fifth seed to begin the '99 season, Stammen went 65-1 during her four years in North Attleboro, including an undefeated senior year.

The Minutewomen must find a way to replace departing seniors Jackie Braunstein and Gillian Kane, along with sophomore Allison Truss.

Win or lose this weekend, the Minutewomen are hopeful this tournament is, above all else, a learning experience. Coach Judy Dixon will be observing both the present stars and the future ones. But depending on the kind of progress they are making, the future could be now.

Ola Gerasimova will lead the Minutewoman tennis team on the court as the squad's No. 1 singles player.

Volleyball to host four at home in UMass Invitational

By Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

The UMass volleyball team is looking for a positive homecoming after a disappointing weekend at the Long Beach State Invitational. The women will be hosting the UMass Invitational Tournament at the Curry Hicke Cage.

Head coach Bonnie Kenny will look to put a bandage on a three-game skid thanks to a west coast trip that pitted the Minutewomen against the nation's finest. Despite a solid showing most notably in a five-set loss to North Carolina, UMass must regroup for a long weekend of volleyball. With two matches both today and tomorrow, the Minutewomen must show their resiliency.

UM will be starting off the weekend against the Seton Hall Pirates today at 2pm. The Pirates are 3-0. They most recently defeated Sacred Heart on Wednesday and hosted their own invitational tournament, defeating Lafayette and Drexel.

The women then face the University of New Hampshire at 7pm. The Wildcats who were the America East Conference Champions last season, have started the season 2-3. UNH was an early favorite to take the America East again, but had setbacks with losses against Oregon, Rutgers, and Fairfield.

UM will wake up early the next morning to face the University of Southern Mississippi at 11:30am. USM has started their season off well, looking to extend their winning streak in the Invitational. The toughest test for UM will come from senior outside hitter Tosha Barnicoat, who was named to the preseason first team in Conference USA. The Golden Eagles return five of their top six players from a team that finished 7th last season in the district poll.

The final match of the weekend for the Minutewomen will be their toughest test, as they toss up the ball against the Spartans of Michigan State University. The Spartans, who were ranked No. 22 in the national poll, fell out of the top 25 for the first time in 15 weeks. MSU now stands at 2-2 on the season, after key losses to then 16th ranked Texas A&M and currenth 18th ranked Clemson.

Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, the invitational marks the return for sophomore Erin Hartley, a 6-2 outside hitter who played on the USA Junior National volleyball team. UM will also have to contend with senior outside hitter Tammy Vonderheide, who set career highs last weekend at the L&L Classic with 9 kills and 28 attacks against Texas A&M.

UMass will look to seniors Kari Hogancamp and Jill Meyers for continued leadership throughout the weekend. The duo both registered double-double against North Carolina. Meyers led the team in kills with 24, while Hogancamp top the team with 24 digs. Meyers is one of only four players in UMass history to record over 1,000 kills and Hoganamp's 24 digs against UNC made her the school's all-time dig leader with 1,301.

tackles, forced two fumbles, recovered three and scored a touchdown.

Helping him at linebacker will be seniors Matt Dawson and Dan Healey. Healey excelled in the preseason, and Dawson has gained a reputation as an all-around threat, nailing down 105 tackles, five sacks, three interceptions and eight passbreakups in 1998.

Putting pressure on UNH signal caller Ryan Day will be an experienced UMass defensive line headed by Chris Pryce. The end out of Boxboro led the squad with eight sacks a year ago, coming on late in the season.

With New Hampshire entering the season predicted near the bottom of the conference in several publications, the Minutemen's biggest enemy might just be themselves, as UM must resist looking ahead to big road games against Villanova and Division I-A Toledo the next two weeks.

"It doesn't really matter," Zullo said. "They're going to come out hard, they're going to play hard. They changed their whole offense around, it's the same kind of offense as ours."

"We're looking at what they did to us last year," Bankhead said. "They probably should have beat us the way they played, and they've got a lot of guys back. Then we look at what they did last week against Rhode Island. I think they scored 57 points against them. They pose a tremendous challenge."

Attention!!!
Saturday's football game between UMass and UNH has been rescheduled. Gametime is set for 12 noon, NOT 1 pm. as previously noted.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) - Your judgment could be a bit impaired today.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) - The new moon later in the day brings thoughts of love and romance to romantic Taurus. You are on firm ground in planning for the future, especially if these plans are of a personal nature. Be willing to step back and take a broad viewpoint what will make you and your partner more happy, relaxed, and renewed in the long run.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) - Cautious and conservative are your watchwords for the day. A loving and giving attitude toward your mate will produce benefits.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) - Emotions you are blessed with patience and a will to even more emphasized today. You are able to deflect the possible barbs that are tossed your way, even those about your imperfections, in word or deed. It is vital to bring your understanding of others to bear.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) - Relax your vigilance as far as possible. Today is not a day to make demands on yourself or on anyone else. That goes especially for people who are in your love and romance sector. They may react badly. Just lie back and let your own (or his or her) nature have its way. If your partner wants to have fun this evening, participate!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) - First impressions count today, Virgo. If you are meeting new people in any of your activities today, think about how you are coming across. Some naturally shy Virgos should feel much more comfortable react to authority figures. Step back and let him or her have the day—and the evening.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) - A sudden inspiration may hit today, and for many it will have to do with furthering their education levels. It appears that your romantic interest of the moment will agree with your decision, and maybe even join you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) - Self-improvement isn't just about dieting and exercise. That's important, but it is equally important to get the agreement of a mate or partner if there are two sources of income. Do not be impulsive in this matter, or you could cause a breach of confidence.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) - You may have discovered that there is a pattern in the relationships you form or that you are constantly drawn toward the same kind of person. If your present relationship is not working out, now is the time to reexamine what you expect from a person you get involved with. Pisces people are occasionally needy, so perhaps the answer is to build up your self-reliance and stop expecting someone else to do the work in a relationship.

Students make the best of housing situation

Arrangements not bad

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Less than a week ago, more than 400 students had been placed in temporary housing spaces across campus. University of Massachusetts Housing Services agreed to pay these students $1.60 per day for living in a lounge or hotel room.

Today, only 15 students are living in the Campus Center Hotel and more students are being moved from lounges into permanent residential living spaces, and most are saying, "It isn't all that bad."

Freshman Dave Seymour is living in a lounge in Orchard Hill. With only one roommate, he said the situation is better than living in a room, and he is planning on staying as long as Housing will allow.

"The balcony is really nice," Seymour said. "They [Housing] are thinking of switching me, but I would love to stay in the lounge."

When junior accounting major Alexis Colon arrived on foreign exchange from Puerto Rico, he didn't expect to be placed in a lounge in Central. However, he said his college had never experienced a housing overflow and having to live in a lounge was only a minor change compared to living in a new culture.

"I was confused at first, but after I got here I was happy," Colon said. "Coming from another place, I am also adapting to the culture and moving out of this room would be another big adaptation."

Colon said he came to UMass with the understanding he would be placed with his friend, Joe Ochoa, a junior management major also on exchange from Puerto Rico. Now that he is sharing a lounge with that friend, he is more than content in staying with the arrangement.

"We didn't have a Housing Services In Puerto Rico so I'm looking at this positively," Colon said. "We don't want to be separated."

Like Colon and Ochoa, senior philosophy major, Rodrigo Gonzalez, is sharing a lounge, and he agrees the lounge is more comfortable than any residence hall room.

"I'm sure a lot of people are unhappy about it, but I am quite content," Gonzalez said. "We would rather stay here than start all over after living here for a month."

When Housing told him he'd be living in a lounge, Gonzalez, on exchange from Florida, didn't know what to expect.

Now that he is seeing his situation from a positive perspective, Gonzalez realizes change would only be negative to his experience at UMass.

Other students, like freshman Michael O'Neill, hope the University will learn from its mistake.

"I think it's negative because we can't study [in the lounge] because someone is living there," O'Neill said. "It's not their fault they have to live there, it's Admission's because they're the ones who let so many people in [the University]."

Joe Marshall of enrollment services said every year the University attempts to predict how many students will come to the University based on last years prediction model. This year more freshmen decided to come than were expected and more upperclassmen decided to stay in housing.

Even though the housing shortage situation hasn't been completely remedied, most students seem to be content with their temporary housing spaces. The problem Housing will now have to face is getting those near 200 students to leave these spaces, more than content in staying with the arrangement.

"We can't understand, as a family, why anyone [pay]. Cases said. But last year we had a 13% drop in [flow and] we had to put them in temporary housing."

Cases said that at UNC no rooms are used as triples that aren't designed to be triples and that students aren't put in lounges. Keeping an eye on the future and its increasing enrollment, UNC is planning to add 1,000 bed spaces by 2001, and another 2,000 by 2008.

"We're adding those bed spaces to care those are sudden surges in admissions?" Cases said.

At the University of New Mexico at Albuquerque, problems from past years, including 90 people housed in triples for up to three or four weeks were avoided this year, according to Dianne Ranvelle, UNM housing reservation supervisor.

"We only house 2,050 students of our 26,000 student body population, but after last year's experience we were ready for it this year," Ranvelle said. "We moved in all two thousand people in phases."

Some students find themselves with blackboards instead of headboards due to their having been temporarily housed in dorm lounges

UMass, campuses nationwide face severe housing shortages

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts is not alone in the struggle to find housing for students.

Approximately 400 students experienced the UMass housing crunch a week ago, and other public institutions have suffered from similar problems.

At the University of Vermont, in Burlington, the assistant to the director of residential life describes campus housing as "very full." UVM houses nearly half of its 8,000 undergraduate students, but the overflow has forced students into new housing arrangements.

"We've got students in triple rooms, which certainly isn't ideal," Halstead said. "On a positive note, we haven't had to turn anybody away."

According to Halstead, some of UVM's rooms have been built to be triples, but the rooms that have been made into triples will start to "break down" as room changes are taken care of. The room changes [illegible] beginning in Halstead.

"We've got probably close to 400 students in triples and we're three to four percent fuller than we were last year," Halstead said. "We've never really had a serious problem, and in fact in the early 90's we had a shortage of students to fill our rooms and we started selling singles to students."

At the University of Rhode Island, Charlie Hall, assistant director of housing for administrative services, said that URI had a "bit of an overflow."

"We had a room selection process that was called 'You Snooze, You Lose' where students who didn't pay their deposit by April 2 would be placed on a waiting list, and so we ended up with 180 people on that waiting list," Hall said.

According to Hall, because URI does not do triples and houses all freshmen in "standard double rooms," students who were on the waiting list got housing only if it was available.

"We didn't have a lot of [illegible] this year," Hall said. "Last year we had 120 triples, but this year we decided not to do that, and I think that to decide how many could be housed," he said, adding, "and we are now full."

URI's problems last year, according to Hall, were a result of the campus realizing too late that its 400 students "oh my God, we have too many people." As a result URI started creating the triples.

Freshman enrollment, one of the reasons cited by UMass Housing Services as a contributor to the overcrowding, has been levels increasing at URI, which means Hall is having to deal with more students in need of housing.

Housing problems have not been limited to public universities in the North.

The University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill while having few problems this year, has in past years seen a student overflow, according to Rebecca Casey, UNC's assistant director for marketing and conference services.

Fair encourages volunteerism

By Erica H. Mattison
Collegian Correspondent

As students try to decide which organizations to take part in, the University of Massachusetts' Office of Community Service Learning at Commonwealth College offers a chance to get involved while serving others. This Tuesday the Campus Center Auditorium will be filled with representatives from 65 organizations for the annual Fall Volunteer Fair.

According to Malcolm Thorpe, the community service program coordinator, students will be able to choose among listed types of service options, including areas pertaining to human services, environmental issues, law/advocacy, government and arts and culture. Post college service opportunities such as Peace Corps and AmeriCorps will also be present. The fair, open to students of all majors and interests, will be held from 11a.m. to 2 p.m.

Community service one of the core values at UMass, is encouraged by opportunities such as internships, practical and volunteer work. The citizen scholars program and the faculty fellowship program epitomize this tradition of service.

The citizen scholars program acknowledges students who distinguish themselves with commitment to service and exemplary academic achievement, while the faculty fellowship program supports faculty interested in developing new service learning courses at UMass.

Over 40 faculty service learning fellows, along with other faculty teaching community service learning courses at UMass. These courses complement new initiatives like the fourth credit option are increasing the service learning opportunities at the University.

Indonesia allows peacekeepers into east timor

By Keith B. Richburg
The Washington Post

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Bowing to intense international pressure, President B.J. Habibie said Sunday night Indonesia will allow armed foreign peacekeepers into East Timor to end a wave of killing and destruction by pro-Indonesian militiamen and his own soldiers and police.

The announcement paved the way for an Australian-led peacekeeping force of up to 7,000 troops to begin operating within in East Timor possibly within days. U.S. officials said the force will likely include a small American contingent, mainly to help with communications, intelligence-gathering and logistics, particularly airlifting troops from participating nations.

President Clinton, in Auckland, New Zealand, for an Asian economic summit, welcomed Indonesia's

The Homeless Cat Project

This Sunday the town green was transformed into an open air market to benefit stray cats. Sponsored by New England Animal Action Inc., The Homeless Cat Project is a non-profit, all-volunteer organization whose mission is to establish managed colonies of neutered/spayed, vaccinated felines in appropriate settings. The group was organized as a result of the publicized killing of homeless cats in South Hadley in the fall of 1998, a situation which, according to the group's newsletter The Cat Colony Courier, has changed significantly due to their efforts. The yard sale yesterday raised money to help fund the rescue efforts of the group, but donations are also key to their being able to save feline lives. The group welcomes anyone who wishes to make a donation or receive a newsletter to contact them at The Homeless Cat Project, P.O. Box 2582, Amherst, MA 01004.

acceptance. But his national-security adviser, Sandy Berger, cautioned that many key details remain to be settled, like the timing for deploying the troops, their relationship with thousands of Indonesian soldiers on the ground and the composition of the new force.

"The devil's in the details here," Berger told reporters in Auckland. "There are a lot of questions that need to be addressed in the coming days."

In making his announcement, Habibie conceded that, despite a martial-law declaration six days ago, his own military has been unable to control the violence that exploded in East Timor after an overwhelming majority of its 800,000 residents voted for independence in a U.N.-sponsored referendum Aug. 30. That, he implied, was the reason Indonesia reversed itself after days of refusing to heed demands for an international peacekeeping force from governments around the world.

"The Indonesian defense forces tried to stabilize the situation in East Timor," Habibie said in a nationally televised address at Merdeka, the presidential palace. "At the same time, they have to recognize that there are limits to what more they could achieve ...They have done their utmost in a very complex and complicated situation, under very difficult psychological constraints."

Habibie did not elaborate, but his military chief, Gen. Wiranto, had earlier conceded that his soldiers would not shoot the militiamen whom they considered "brothers in arms."

"Too many people have lost their lives since the beginning of the unrest, lost their homes and security," Habibie declared. "We cannot wait any longer. We have to stop the suffering."

The announcement marked a dramatic, and in some ways humiliating, turnaround for Habibie and Wiranto, who had ruled out foreign troops as long as East Timor remains an Indonesian province. Although the Aug. 30th vote was a clear-cut expression of desire for independence after 24 years of Indonesian occupation, the decision must still be ratified by the Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly that meets in October.

The independence vote triggered the widespread violence and destruction that has left the East Timorese capital, Dili, in smoldering ruins and has created hundreds of thousands of refugees — some trucked across the border into western Timor and others hiding in the forests and hills. There have also been repeated and consistent reports of orchestrated massacres, particularly of Roman Catholic priests and nuns seen as independence supporters.

Habibie said Sunday night he is dispatching his foreign minister, Ali Alatas, to New York to work out details of the peacekeeping operation with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan and members of the Security Council.

Clinton Warns Russian Prime Minister Over Money Laundering

By John F. Harris
Washington Post

AUCKLAND, New Zealand – President Clinton warned Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin Monday that money laundering and other forms of financial corruption are a problem that "could eat the heart out of Russian society."

In an hour-long session, Clinton met for the first time with President Boris Yeltsin's newest senior deputy. The meeting comes while long-standing concerns about financial corruption at the top levels of Russian society are flaring anew, and domestic U.S. critics are asserting that the Clinton administration has based too much of its Russia policy on support for Yeltsin.

Clinton also used the gathering of the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum to host a three-way meeting with Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi and South Korean President Kim Dae Jung. The session centered on North Korea, which concluded six days of talks Monday with U.S. officials in Berlin designed to avert a new missile test by the Pyongyang government. Western officials in the German capital said that North Korea had agreed to what amounts to a freeze in the missile testing program, a move that clears the way for better relations with the United States and its key Asian allies.

The administration, led by former defense secretary William J. Perry, is currently reviewing its North Korean policy.

Clinton's vivid language in the session with Putin, recounted after the meeting by national security advisor Sandy Berger, was cited by administration officials as a reflection of how seriously the president regards the problem.

In a telephone conversation last week with Yeltsin, the Russian president said that his political adversaries were promoting the allegations of widespread corruption amid reports that federal prosecutors suspect billions of dollars in ill-gotten gains may have been laundered through the Bank of New York.

While Putin also cited politics, his response as U.S. officials described it was somewhat less dismissive than Yeltsin's. "He acknowledged that money-laundering problems exist in Russia, while emphasizing that the problem was not unique to Russia," Berger said. Referring to a team of law-enforcement officials due in Washington this week to talk about money laundering, Putin promised a "cooperative approach in dealing with the problem."

Berger said Putin also struck a non-combative note on other issues where the two nations have been at odds, including the administration's efforts to modify an antiballistic missile treaty to allow development of missile-defense technologies. Clinton has said the threat of missiles from terrorists or rogue states justifies changes to the treaty, which has drawn objections from Russia.

Putin told Clinton that ratification of the Start II nuclear weapons treaty, which U.S. officials specifically have portrayed as on the verge of passage for several years, remains stalled in the Russian parliament. Putin said "that ratification of START II right now would be difficult, but he said that we're trying our best and he thought there was some wavering among the opposition to START II," Berger said.

Berger said Clinton was pleased by the meeting with the new prime minister, who formerly served as the Russian equivalent of national security adviser.

"The president felt that he is somebody who has fairly substantial experience in the Russian system and, therefore, perhaps to a greater extent than some of his predecessors may be able to work the system," Berger said.

Buchanan Strongly Suggests He Would Seek Reform Party Nomination

By Terry M. Neal
Washington Post

Republican presidential candidate Patrick J. Buchanan strongly suggested Sunday that he would drop out of the party to seek the Reform Party's nomination.

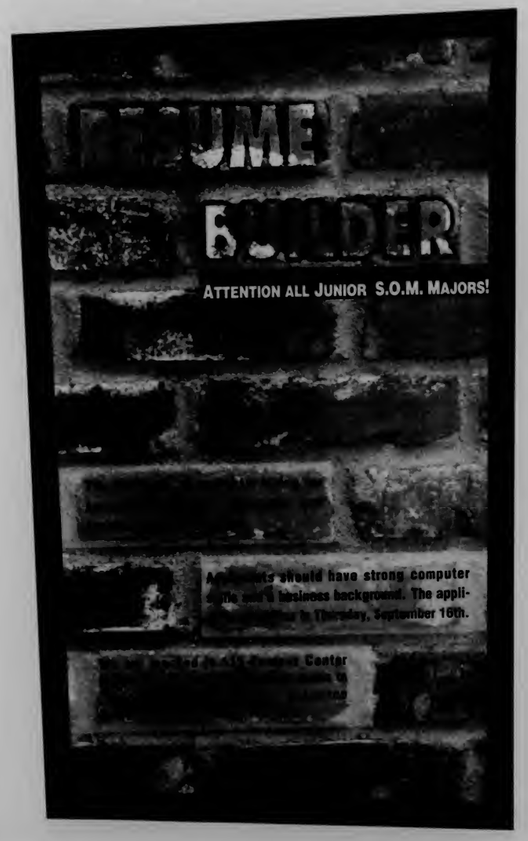
Buchanan has struggled to find support and has accused the Republican establishment of rushing to coronate Texas Gov. George W. Bush, who has a strong lead in the polls and an overwhelming advantage in fund-raising. Asked on ABC's "Meet the Press" Sunday if he would support Bush if he wins the nomination, Buchanan said "I cannot make that commitment because the GOP has become a carbon copy of the Democratic Party in many respects.

"So we are taking a hard look at leaving the Republican nomination run and running for the Reform Party's nomination," Buchanan said. The decision has not been made yet, but I think it's much more open and American would get a real choice if that happened."

Buchanan's defection from the GOP would be a major development in the race because it could siphon support from the party's nominee. A poll last week by Zogby International had Bush leading Vice President Al Gore, the potential Democratic nominee, 50 percent to 36 percent. But a poll last month by Schroth & Associates suggests Bush's numbers could drop significantly with Buchanan in the race. It had Bush at 38 percent, Gore at 33 and Buchanan at 16.

Earlier this summer, New Hampshire Sen. Bob Smith dropped out of the GOP to wage a campaign as an independent.

Sunday, Buchanan said the time of formation favors the two major parties has thinned. "I think what we need is a real opposition party, a party that can transform a second party and maybe a first party," he said.



Should he would make a decision by Oct. 15, Buchanan added, "I'm not honestly we're leaning at this point right now."

"Strongly?" interviewer Tim Russert asked.

Strongly, Buchanan replied.

Republican National Committee Chairman Jim Nicholson has sought a meeting with Buchanan, but it has not occurred yet, an RNC spokesman said. He added that he could not reach party leaders for comment Sunday afternoon on Buchanan's statements.

Some Republicans still resent Buchanan's challenges to eventual nominee Bob Dole in 1996 and to Bush's father, who was the incumbent president in 1992. Sunday, Buchanan said he cannot endorse the Republican nominee as of now because "my party at the national level has become a Xerox copy basically of the Democratic Party. It's pro-NAFTA, pro-GATT, pro-WTO, pro-MFN for China, in favor of intervention in Kosovo and Bosnia, in favor of NATO expansion, in favor of open-borders immigration. Mr. Bush is even in favor of expanding our Department of Education."

The Machmer Advisor Project

A Collegian writer went into Machmer Hall to speak to an advisor (and make a highly lucrative documentary of it), never returned. A year later, excerpts from his journal, in convenient columnar form, were found under a pile of lost and loan applications in Whitmore. Don't ask how that's another story for another time.

Day One: It's been [illegible] hours since I [illegible] Machmer in search of [illegible] that to speak with his advisor, Professor Bird. (I had to [illegible] I didn't think it possible to spend so much time standing for one room. I don't think to bring much more than my Notre Game bars and a flask of water. Also, my tent isn't water repellant – it's UMass issue.

Well, let's hope a tent to see an advisor, especially if you never can be too careful. I suppose it will suspension of disbelief, people. No more questions.

Day Two: One night has come and gone and let me tell you it was scary. At several points, I heard spooks noises, like the beginnings of engineering lectures and Congressional Security briefings. I damn near shat myself out of fright, but I couldn't stand the cold in the bathroom so I got over it.

Day Three: Last night my tent was shaken, but strangely, not stirred. I now believe that the mythical Pierce Brosnan is roaming about through the halls of Machmer. I could tell because there was a huge claw mark in the side my flask that could have been made by only a large, carnivorous cat, a professional wrestler or Pierce Brosnan. I'm quite positive I would have heard a wrestler bellowing about how he was going to strangle me with my own intestines, but since I heard nothing, it must have been Pierce.

Day Four: In the interest of making roughly six zillion percent profit on the sales of this experience, I decided to put what's left of this on film, and promptly sign a deal with Hasbro to make action figures. Using my cinematographic expertise, I will direct a long-standing scene wherein the camera points directly up my nose, and I whimper about how much of a bonehead I am for ever thinking that I could get in contact with an advisor in the first place.

Day Five: After several takes, the cast and crew dealing with the whimper scene grew tired and hungry and sat down and said, in a very professional manner, "To hell with this." I then realized that I was the only one there and began to question my own sanity. After a lengthy interview process, I found that my sanity checked out AOK!

Day Six: Today is the day I officially lost my marbles, which is a crying shame because when you're alone in an unfamiliar place, practicing with your cat's eye is about the only thing worth doing. I think something out-of-this-world took them. Something vile and heinous that will stop at nothing to see society crumble and fall in the name of all that is evil. That's right, I am convinced that these hallways are inhabited by the Spice Girls. Things are much worse than I thought.

Day Seven: I accidentally kicked my topographical map of Machmer into a stream. Damn!

Day Eight: All sorts of scary beings are all around me, like the Loch Ness Monster (Nessie), Sasquatch (Big Foot) and Darth Vader (Anakin Skywalker). I can't remember a number of important pieces of information, such as where I am and why I came in the first place, and, more important, by the last name of the girl that I discussed the UMass squirrel conspiracy with a year ago. First names do me no good with phone directories, sadly.

Day Nine: Panic started to set in today, as I'm quite sure that I've missed a weekend of football by now. If any of you are in earshot as this panic is setting in, you can hear my delirious laughter and hallucinated claims, such as: Britney Spears isn't exploited. It is obvious at this point, that I have no idea what I'm talking about – although I'm doing a splendid job recording this psychosis, yes?

Day Ten: Pretty soon I won't be able to count the days on my fingers, and, because my tier-two math class was linguistics, I'm not entirely sure what day comes next. Forty-two, perhaps... I'm still working on it.

Day Forty-Two: Wow. 42 days. If you consider that a month is roughly 30 days, I've been stuck here for... six years, three days and five minutes.

Day Forty-Three: I think I'm near my advisor's office now – completely by accident. A friend that I forgot to say anything about earlier in the article was kidnapped and had their stomach pulled out through their nose, or something gruesome like that. I swore that I heard screaming coming from the West, which I know is the West because in that direction the rooms have a "W" on them, like W-24, W-25, and, amazingly, W-26.

Day Forty-Four: I'm busy being slaughtered by some demon creature, today. Ow, ow, ow, ah! That'll definitely leave a mark. Luckily, I'm a communications major and even though I've missed 44 days of class, I'm most likely passing my classes with an A/B. I'm going to die a horrible death now. Bye.

Letters to the Editor

Everyone please, remember Allison

To the editor:

I was almost hit in a crosswalk the other day. I threw my arms up in frustration as the young driver accelerated past me, casually gesturing with his middle finger. A Physical Plant employee was recently hit in the same crosswalk. It is within 500 feet of the crosswalk where Allison Lustig, 19, was tragically killed this past March.

As a graduate student and staff member, I appeal to all my colleagues, students and employees alike: Remember Allison. Those of you who are new on campus or who may not remember, Allison was one of two people killed in our crosswalks last year. Other pedestrians were also hit in University crosswalks and seriously injured.

Allison was a member of the band and a vibrant, intelligent, talented and much admired young woman. Her death was tragic. Nearly 500 people attended her memorial service in the Newman Center. The shame of it is that, given the cultural attitude of the driver who nearly hit me, it will probably be another year with a tragedy.

It is a state law that you must stop for pedestrians in the crosswalk. You must stop the moment they step off the curb. If they are on the other side of the road, you must stop when they are within five feet of the centerline. You must remain completely stopped until their feet are firmly on the opposite curb.

As a driver, do not stop and wave someone off the curb, to step out in front of moving traffic if you cannot guarantee that the other drivers will also stop. As a responsible driver, do not create an unsafe condition into which you invite the pedestrian to walk.

If you are a pedestrian, bicyclist or rollerblader, do not step out in front of moving vehicles where they would be required to swerve or apply their brakes to avoid hitting you. Be particularly careful at dusk or in rainy conditions. If at a signalized intersection, push the crosswalk button and wait for the walk signal to cross. Do not join the half of all pedestrians in the U.S. who ignore the crosswalk signal.

The Pedestrian Safety Committee is investigating how to make our crosswalks safer and more visible. Any physical improvements will do nothing to enhance crosswalk safety, however, if the cultural attitude demonstrated by the younger driver I encountered the other day prevail.

Act responsibly, be respectful and please... remember Allison.

Do We Really Need Gen. Eds?

I don't hate general education requirements. I hate being forced to take them. We here at UMass are forced to take courses, most of which have no relevance to what we really want to learn about: our majors. About half of our college careers are spent on courses that provide us with information that vaporizes from our consciousness two weeks after we finish our last exams. People have enough trouble remembering the relevant information in their lives. If I can't even remember a good friend's telephone number how will I remember symmetrical algebraic equations? Why are our minds being flooded with knowledge we don't need?

Jason Czernich

I'm not saying that Gen Ed courses are totally useless – some have really come in handy and have even provided me with some amusement. In my everyday life. One general education course that should be required is Philosophy 100. It deals with using logic to think more clearly and it helps to organize your thoughts and ideas. Everybody needs to think for him or herself and organize one's thoughts, so this is a Gen. Ed. that everybody can use. I took it with Professor Baker and it was a very fun course. I found it amazing how I could use it to get my point across even when I was illustrating weird points. One time I argued with a fellow student about trust and I wanted to see just how far I could go with what I just learned in Philosophy 100.

As this argument went on, this fellow student got very riled up because she could not find a way around my logically formed arguments. The more riled she got the more her arguments started to crumble. In the end I stood by my idea of what trust was. She could not shake my picture of it. She ended her involvement in this argument by trying to convince me that a shoe can trust a rock. Yes, this is a true story, it really did happen.

Where Philosophy 100 was extremely fun and useful, science and math courses held no merit for me. Sometimes when I was younger I would come home from school cursing both. All the math I need for the real world I took in high school. I'm not going to become a scientist or a mathematician. I major in Theater and English. Math and science aren't on my favorite side of the brain.

Worse yet, most Gen. Ed.'s are scheduled at the worst time of day for courses, anytime before 10:00 am. During my first semester here at UMass my Anthropology 100 discussion group met at 8:50 in the morning! I even wrote my T.A. thought that we were actually there of our own free will. She was even sometimes patronizing:

T.A.: "You see Jason, you're supposed to take a highlighter and go over the important ideas in your textbook."

Jason: "But that'll only decrease the value of the book and you know how they cheat you enough already when it comes to textbook buyback time."

That's another thing that irritates me about having to take Gen. Ed.'s: the textbooks for them are too expensive. Why do courses not designed for majors have hefty prices on their textbooks? I didn't keep most of my Gen. Ed. books. I couldn't wait to get rid of them at the end of the semester, but I've always thought that it's just plain wrong to pay fifty dollars for a hardcover book and get only a third of that price back at the end of the semester!

After all these points of negativity I will say one thing in favor of Gen. Ed.'s... they're great for people who haven't yet declared a major. If you can't decide what you want to do with your life or need to fill a hole in your schedule then take a Gen. Ed. and you can sample a major just like that. That's about the only good thing I can say about Gen. Ed.'s.

For the rest of us, the "decided" Gen. Ed.'s are a major hindrance for our resume. If we take all these irrelevant classes outside our major, when can we take all the classes we truly want and need inside our major? While it's true that UMass gives you ample time for Gen. Ed. and major requirements, it is also true that the more classes you complete in your major the more you can put on your resume under the heading "classes taken" or "education", and of course that can only increase your chances of getting a job in the field of your major. If a potential employer asks me, "What educational background do you have in the field of scenic design?" I don't want to tell him, "Well I don't really have much experience in that area because most of my time was spent learning about aquatic food chains and the Irish Tinkers."

Some of these teachers who teach Gen. Ed.'s are truly insane! They think that their class is far majors when it was actually designed to be a Gen. Ed. They think their class is the only one that matters. They do weird things like yelling, "woo" like a Beatle or they do evil things like playing John Tesh videos before class. I'm told the sophisticated term for these teachers is nuts. They leave me with a creepy feeling so I will digress quickly from this point...

I'm glad I've got all my Gen. Ed.'s behind me. Some I truly loved such as Philosophy 100, the two Psychology classes I took, and Sociology 105, but most I found useless. I do believe that knowledge is power, but shouldn't we be able to choose what we want to learn? People will learn better in an environment where they choose to be, where they choose to learn. We have to want to learn. We can't be forced into lecture halls by the hundreds to learn about something that takes us away from the interests of our future. Knowledge is power but power cannot and should not be forced into an individual's consciousness. We have to make an effort to invite it in. We are adults not toddlers. Now if you'll excuse me I have to break up a fight between my shoe and my pet rock.

Jason Czernich is a UMass student.

Guns (can you dig it?)

How recent attacks by gun-totting [illegible] kids have got you riled down? Well, maybe we've got a solution now. I know, gun control! This is sort of a touchy subject for the hard-liners (but what isn't, right? Charlton Heston says guns are good, and Rosie O'Donnell says guns are bad but Ben Hur blows away anything on daytime TV. Besides, Chuck has a more convincing way about him. Tom Selleck kills Mr. Heston's aura though. I hate that stupid little mustache.) Well, the point is that these high profile lobbyists are two-one-dimensional. It's pretty clear that people have trouble moving towards the middle ground.

Some gun control is perfectly sensible. What's wrong with background checks? The newest checking programs take about 30 seconds for most buyers if the New York Times is to be believed. That doesn't seem so terribly hard to me. People convicted of violent crimes don't get sold guns without a little discretion, and we won't be able to use assault rifles this hunting season. Where's the harm?

Of course, gun advocates have some nice points too, particularly with regard to the Constitution. I hear people say that back then, people used guns to hunt and such, so the Right to Bear Arms is now obsolete. Whoa there! We also have guns to protect ourselves, from assailants and from the State. That's right, the government (those creeps). Inevitably we will need to fight a new revolution; that's how this government arrangement works. I'm no militiaman, and I don't think that that revolution will be anytime soon, but one can never be too well armed.

Personally, I think I'll apply for a concealed weapon license someday. Actually I don't know if Massachusetts even has them, but if so, I want mine! How cool is that? My own "Glorified G". Then if any of my crackpot co-workers goes 'day-trader' and tries to gun me down, I'll be like, "hey, die sucka'," then I'll drop him like a bad habit. Bickity Bam Mf!

All you psychos and dissatisfied customers can consider this fair warning... foo'. and don't think I'm kidding. Feeble humor aside, I really may want a small, concealed gun. I want to be a concerned citizen. On the other hand, I will happily concede to a background check and I think you should too. Compromise is the way to go; you can't ban me from having guns unilaterally, but you can make sure I'm not a bad guy first.

There was a knife attack in Japan this past week by a guy who cracked from being unable to find a job. I don't know if it's fairer to say that guns kill people or people kill people, but people kill people more effectively with guns. Therefore, I'm glad this guy had a knife and not a pistol or else he most likely would have killed more than two people before being subdued. Now to be fair, if he had needed to pass a background check he probably would have, but at least a shotgun or rifle was even farther from his grasp.

I don't even know what gun control laws are like in Japan. I suspect they are rather stringent. I know Europe tends to have extremely severe gun control laws, but they have a long history of bloody revolutions over there and may not have much faith in the loyalty of their teeming masses.

By the way, if I'm making a fool of myself right now by being mistaken or factually ignorant about foreign gun control habits, please do enlighten me when we next run into each other.

One particularly sketchy bit of the gun business is the concept of "gun shows". They sound ridiculously redneck to me. Little traveling death merchants grouping in caravans for protection as they set up shop in a convention center near you. I am more comfortable with Monster Trucks and WWF, if that's possible. What's wrong with sticking to the usual channels, Guns and Ammo magazine and the like.

Realistically, the real guns to be worried about are probably traded underground, after being stolen or lost from a local army base. Of course, there's also that Chinese ship in California that was caught shipping AK-47s to urban gangs. Maybe the survivalists got them too, who can tell? They're probably too busy digging bomb shelters and hoarding canned prunes to be much bother anyway.

Oh yes, gun safety. I remember gun safety from the old Boy Scout summer camp rifle range days. The first rule of guns is: treat EVERY gun as it were LOADED with the safety OFF and ready to FIRE. Accidents happen every day, and too often to children. If you have kids, you may want to keep your little friend a secret, and don't underestimate a child's ability to get into trouble even if it's well hidden. Keep the gun locked away, and for God's sake, buy a trigger lock. As that billboard on the Mass Pike says: "It's easier to child proof your gun than to bullet proof your child."

So ends my rant. Thanks for joining me.

Paul Kitchin is a UMass Student.

R.E.M. delivers a spirited final show

Band reflects on their history during great set

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

R.E.M.
Tweeter Center
Sept. 11

MANSFIELD — It was end of the tour as they knew it for R.E.M. Saturday night at the Tweeter Center. For a band that has gone through some drastic changes in the past few years- Michael Stipe, Mike Mills and Peter Buck have certainly been able to ebb and flow through some difficult situations, both personnel wise, and musically. Saturday was the last date of the first tour without former drummer Bill Berry. Although R.E.M closed the tour on a bittersweet note, the spirits of the band were high, and so were that of the audience.

Through the luminescent glow of neon, Stipe, Mills and Buck took the stage from openers Spaceboy. The sly guitar riff of "Lotus" opened the show smoothly. The high energy of "What's the Frequency, Kenneth?" was the firs actual jolt of adrenaline given to the crowd. Stipe, after apologizing in advance for any melancholy overtones caused by the imminent end of the tour, treated the audience to some earlier material with "Wolves, Lower" from the 1981 EP Chronic Town.

"Electrolite," from 1996's New Adventures in Hi-fi, and "Suspicion," from their most recent release, last year's Up, were some earlier songs performed. During the latter song, Stipe made a point of referring to the band's past by making a gesture used by flight attendants to signal that something is behind them. This gesture made for one of the aforementioned melancholy moments, if a bit cryptic.

"Daysleeper," the first single from Up, featured some neon images of a coffee cup, a crescent moon, and a figure reading a newspaper. An as yet untitled song ended the "catching up on lost time" for a bit as Stipe dedicated "The One I Love" to all the "supersappy, menopausal motherfuckers." Stipe alternated between crooning and thrashing as the song was presented louder and harder than the version on Document.

After playing "The Apologist" and "Sweetness Follows," Stipe gave a shout-out to the late Andy Kaufman with "The Great Beyond," a song that will be featured on the soundtrack to director Milos Forman's upcoming film Man on the Moon, starring Jim Carrey as Kaufman.

"Fall On Me" from Life's Rich Pageant was played next: dedicated to longtime fans in lieu of the end of the tour. Stipe presented the song with all the melodramatic trimmings, making it impossible to say that Stipe did not put himself into his performance.

The quiet beauty of "Find the River," from 1992's Automatic For the People was introduced by Stipe as "Peter's favorite song." The lyrics "Leave the road and memorize/ this life that pass before my eyes/and nothing is going my way," as Stipe sang them, was enough to give one chills. "Find the River" was undeniably one of the best moments of the show.

"Feeling beautiful now?" Stipe asked before playing "At My Most Beautiful," another song from Up. As Stipe sang about reading bad poetry into a machine, it wasn't so much beautiful as it was cute.

Buck strapped on the mandolin for "Losing My Religion," and Stipe did some "goofing on Elvis" with "Man on the Moon," before leaving the stage.

He returned to the stage a few moments later to do an acapella version of "Leave," from Hi-fi, and donned an acoustic guitar for "Hope," before the rest of the band returned for the extended encore, "Crush With Eyeliner" and "Tongue," both from 1994's Monster were early highlights of the encore.

Weekend Box Office

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

After a summer best five weeks atop the box office, The Sixth Sense finally succumbed to newcomer, Stigmata, over this past weekend. For the first time, The Sixth Sense failed to collect over $20 million in box office receipts and lost the top spot as a result.

Stigmata, featuring Patricia Arquette as a hairdresser who manifests the wounds of Christ and Gabriel Byrne as a priest sent to investigate, earned an impressive non-summer open of $19.3 million on 2,899 screens.

The Sixth Sense remained strong, though, with $17 million this weekend, bringing its total to $198 million. That's currently third for the summer with Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me well in sight ($205 million).

The Kevin Bacon vehicle, Stir of Echoes, rounded out the psycho, horror thriller top three. In the movie, Bacon plays a man haunted by otherworldly visions after being hypnotized. Distributor Artisan managed to capitalize on the overwhelming success of The Blair Witch Project by coupling ads and trailers for Stir of Echoes with Blair. As a result, the movie managed to collect $6.2 million on a paltry 1,888 screens for a respectable 3,284 per screen average.

Runaway Bride continued its successful release, placing fourth with $3.9 million and $140 million overall. Steve Martin's comedy, Bowfinger ($3.7 million) and Antonio Banderas' action flick, The 13th Warrior ($2.9 million), claimed fourth and fifth respectively.

The Thomas Crown Affair continues to prove that people like Pierce Brosnan in typical Bond-esque movies can have staying power. Earning ($2.9 million) this weekend was good enough for sixth and makes Thomas Crown one of only two real summer movies remaining in the top 10 (Blair Witch Project).

Mickey Blue Eyes ($2.3 million) and Chill Factor ($1.9 million) both dropped over 50% from last week, as did most films in the top 10, proving that the box office is ready for some fresh blood. Relief should come next week with the opening of For Love of The Game and Blue Streak.

The Blair Witch Project rounds out this week's top 10 with $1.6 million, giving Artisan two top 10 movies for the first time in its history. Go indies.

Finally, the other opener this weekend, Love Stinks, starring French Stewart, performed dismally, failing to place in the top 10.

Comical Guster amazes fans; goldfish live for next show

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

GUSTER
Sept. 10
Pearl Street Nightclub

NORTHAMPTON – Just how far has the Boston trio come since their days performing on the city's intimate stages? Consider that two nights before and for the first time ever the band was awarded a particular request in their rider requirements. The prerequisite, a fish tank filled with hearty goldfish, symbolized the level of respect that the band is beginning to receive from across the music industry. As in customary Guster fashion, they invited a fan onstage, however the crowd, with help from the band, coaxed one particular participant into swallowing one of the poor sushi.

This past Friday's show at Pearl Street may not have had this level of theatrics, as the venue wisely opted not to provide them with any goldfish, so instead they pleased a packed crowd with just their distinctive sound and onstage improvisation.

The band hit the crowd hard with songs from their amazing forthcoming major label debut, Lost and Gone Forever. The album is going to be very difficult to top and should be on many critics best of '99 lists by the year's end. From start to finish, it is not only the best album of the year, but a defining trend in the future of [illegible]

The lead single off the album entitled "Barrel Of A Gun" has quickly been moving up the charts as stations continue to add it to their play lists. The fans reacted excitedly to the new track as they sung along. The show also featured the album's lead track "What You Wish For" along with many old favorites like the "Airport Song," which was the first song that the band had mainstream airplay success with, that was off their independent release Goldfly.

"Center of Attention" and "What You Wish For," which features the band whistling kept the crowd in awe while the well crafted "La La

Previous to Guster leaving the stage, they notified the audience what to expect during their brief intermission. After walking off the stage, their water bottles were replaced along with a drum and their roadie gave the thumbs up, true to what the band stated would happen. They then moved into another new track, "Either Way."

So don't forget, next time you attend a Guster show, bring a bag of goldfish, but in cracker-form as The Collegian advises people to be animal-friendly, and send a few onstage during their new song "What You Wish For," just because what you wish for may actually come true.

Guster's remarkable major label debut, Lost and Gone Forever, will be released on Tuesday, September 28. Their next area performance will be at Radio 104's Big Day Off on Friday, September 24 with 311, Everclear, the Push Stars, Rane, and the Verve Pipe. You can purchase your tickets for that show through PROTIX at (860) 422-0000. A Boston show is planned for the Orpheum Theatre on Saturday, October 30. Check the Collegian's Thursday's calendar section for additional information or hope on Guster's homepage at www.guster.com

Stigmata
Directed by Rupert Wainwright with Patricia Arquette and Gabriel Byrne
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Stigmata is one of a slew of new pseudo-religious thrillers playing off society's increased fascination with spirituality as the new millennium approaches. The story, one of demonic possession and the resurfacing of ancient texts, is ripe with potential for a relevant, challenging and haunting movie. The execution, however, leaves much to be desired, and ultimately, Stigmata amounts to a decent story idea smothered by pointless stabs at symbolism and interesting but unnecessary directorial approaches.

Frankie Paige (Patricia Arquette), a party-going hairdresser and self-professed atheist, is terrified to discover that, wound by wound, she is being subjected to Stigmata, the injuries that Christ underwent during his crucifixion. Her life begins to unravel as the violent and painful stigmatic episodes escalate, and Gabriel Byrne (Mark Adair-Rios), a priest charged with investigating and (when appropriate) debunking religious miracles, becomes involved with Paige, doing what he can to interpret the religious events taking place, and uncover their significance.

Stigmata's two main characters are sufficiently convincing, if unable to separate themselves from their respective stereotypes (we've seen the whole doubting holy man persona done before). The semi-romantic relationship which develops between them seems a little too contrived, not to mention unnecessary to the plot, but it never becomes a distraction.

The movie's directoral style turns out to be the big drawback. Much of the movie has the look and feel of a music video, using lighting, film speed, and picture quality to create a story drenched in the energetic world of 20-something city life. This would have been wonderful if the movie had not been about ancient religious texts and horrors of the spiritual world. The musical score, composed by Smashing Pumpkins frontman Billy Corgan, is hauntingly soft and subtle (perhaps too subtle); the soundtrack also includes pounding rock songs by various artists more befitting an episode of Road Rules.

Director Rupert Wainwright seems endlessly obsessed with images of blood dripping into water, and reversed film that makes water fall upwards. Why? Beats me. If there is some significance to these cinematic tropes, they are too esoteric to be of any use to the viewer, and only make the director look like he's patting himself on the back for being so clever and artistic.

Certain scenes seem like little more than excuses for Wainwright to play the role of cinematic visionary, contributing nothing to the movie's story line, and displaying the sort of pointless atmospheric manipulation that defines this movie's directoral efforts. The result? Confusion and distraction, mostly. I was often too busy wondering why the movie looked the way it did to concentrate on the story ideas at work.

By the end of the movie, Stigmata does manage to pull itself together and conclude with a respectable degree of beauty and integrity, but the film's religious overtones are too neglected during the majority of the movie, making the final realization ring a little hollow. Stigmata receives high marks for its ambitious approach to style and the potential of its script, but the final product seems too disorganized and loosely structured.

Rising Erelli graduates to Horse

MARK ERELLI
Sept 10
Iron Horse Music Hall

NORTHAMPTON - Friday night marked another milestone in Mark Erelli's quickly developing career as he graduated from the ranks of coffeehouse elite and venue-opener to headliner of one of the most admired clubs in the nation. The sharp young songwriter confidently displayed his telling signs of future success with each pluck of a guitar string and roll of a vowel.

Erelli's on-stage presence kept drinks on tables and individuals left motionless, fearful of any mistaken clatter as a result of an improper lift. Local music industry leaders, mostly tucked into the corners of the venue and seated at the candle-light tables, were taken aback by his near sellout performance.

Gracefully taking the stage, Erelli, roared into songs like "Do It Everyday" and "Hollow Man" off his self-titled label debut. Mixing in covers and ironically performing a song about relationships with an image of a motel sign as a backdrop, he kept the rhythm smoothly flowing.

With Erelli's support band dismissing the stage, he moved into pieces by inspiring artists, before welcoming back his fellow musicians and transferring into songs of his own. He continued to dazzle the crowd until the end of his encore.

The songwriter's latest significant break in the music industry came when he won the Kerrville Folk Festival last spring. The festival has helped launch the careers of Nanci Griffith, Lyle Lovett, and John Gorka and many others in the past 25 years.

This past summer he performed as a part of the Telluride Bluegrass Festival, Rocky Mountain Folks Festival, Falcon Ridge Festival and Folk Festival in the Pines, aiding him in the rapid expansion of his fan base.

Discovered during the wee-hours of an industry showcase, Erelli is gearing up to be quite a success story in the world of music. He is a performer that can sway even those most resistant to folk music with talent alone. Make sure to check out Erelli next time he comes back to play the area as he will forever change your perspectives of folk music.

one stepped up when we needed them to."

The visitors then tallied the game-winning goal with just under eight minutes left. Dick was once again in the right place at the right time, as she headed home an offer from Allison Calfieri to give TCU the lead.

"They only had one player in front, and we had players who were just standing there and looking around," said Rudy in response to his view of the game-winning goal. "This loss reminded me of the one we had against BYU [Brigham Young] last year, but it wasn't quite as bad. We gave up two goals in three minutes in that one [the BYU game]."

Senior Angie Napoli recorded 11 saves in net to post her second shutout in as many outings for the Minutewomen.

"We played good enough to win. We saved three balls off the goal line, but we expended a lot of energy, and I think it showed today [in the loss to TCU]," Rudy said.

Despite the sour ending to the weekend, Rudy is still convinced that his squad will get back on the right track this week before heading to Williamsburg, Virginia, next weekend to face William and Mary and Old Dominion.

"I guess this is all part of finding out what we have, what we don't have and where we have to go. I still have confidence that we are going to do good things," he said.

Twins Milton no-hits Anaheim

By Mike DiGiovanno
Los Angeles Times

MINNEAPOLIS, MN – The Angels broke out the drill bits and hard hats for another excavation job Saturday, burrowing their way to such extreme depths that not even Indiana Jones could find these guys.

The latest low in their season-long temple of gloom came when Minnesota Twin left-hander Eric Milton, who entered Saturday's game with a 6-11 record, tossed what had to be one of baseball's most effortless no-hitters in a 7-0 victory over the Angels before 11,222 in the Metrodome.

Milton, relying almost exclusively on a fastball that topped out at 92 mph, had a career-high 13 strikeouts. He walked two and didn't give up anything close to a hit, breezing through an Angel lineup that was even more obscure than Minnesota's.

The Twins may field the best triple A team in the major leagues, but they were not to be outdone Saturday by the Angels, whose starting nine – Jeff DaVanon, Orlando Palmeiro, Todd Greene, Troy Glaus, Steve Decker, Matt Lake, Bret Hemphill, Trent Durrington and Andy Sheets – looked more suited for a Cactus League split-squad game in Peoria, Ariz.

A no-hitter for Eric Milton? Heck, Uncle Milton could have shut down this club.

And how's this for astonishing: While a lineup that included five players who spent significant time in the minor leagues this year and one who was hurt most of the season flailed away at Milton's less-than-baffling offerings – showing little or no discipline at the plate – Mo Vaughn, Tim Salmon, Jim Edmonds, Garret Anderson, Darin Erstad and Gary DiSarcina sat on the bench.

Not one regular was asked to loosen up for a possible pinch-hit appearance. Not one entered the game, which ended with Durrington, Sheets and DaVanon making the final outs: the Twins mobbing Milton on the mound after he blew a fastball by DaVanon for strike three.

Women's tennis up and down

By Matt Seifert
Collegian Correspondent

Going into the weekend, UMass women's tennis Coach Judy Dixon wanted to see where her team was at this point in the season and what progress they had made. After this weekend's tournament, her feelings were somewhat mixed.

On Saturday freshman Beth Ebert and junior April Madani came through with the Minutewomen's most convincing victory, winning their match 8-2 over the solid Temple doubles pair of Tanja Zecic and Nina Kumar in the Flight 3 doubles consolation semifinals.

With the win on Saturday, they had to play the Syracuse doubles team of Shervin Saedinia and Tricia Sargent. That match was almost an exact opposite to the one in which they had dominated just the previous day. Madani and Zecic suffered a crushing 8-1 defeat. As a result the tandem of Saedima and Sargent won the feed-in championship and along with it, a 5th place finish.

In singles play on Saturday, Ola Gerasimova squared off against Syracuse's Shareem Lai. Gerasimova battled but came out on the losing end as she fell 6-3, 6-4 in straight sets.

Sunday, Gerasimova faced Donna Krauzman of Rutgers. Krauzman proved too tough for Gerasimova and defeated her 6-2, 6-3 en route to a fifth place finish.

One of the success stories of the weekend, however, was the play of the doubles combo of Helena Horak and the freshman Katie Stammen. On Saturday the pair were matched up against Boston University's Christina Causway and Karen Shostakowsky. Horak and Stammen enjoyed immediate success in the quarterfinals, leveling their BU opponents by a count of 8-4. But turn around was only fair play, and in the next round. The sophomore/freshman pairing fell to the Cornell squad of Jodie Hurley and Alex DelPrete in an 8-4 whitewash.

When it was time for play on Sunday the pair were faced against the Rutgers duo of Kristin Shaughnessy and Amandas Travalor. It was obvious that the Massachusetts duo of Horak and Stammen were looking for redemption

The Massachusetts pair went on to defeat the Rutgers opponents in a decisive 8-5 victory. The victory over Rutgers gave Horak and Stammen a solid third place finish in Flight two doubles.

So now Judy Dixon and the UMass tennis team will have a week to do some careful assessment of progress made thus far. The tournament offered a good early test to the squad, which is looking to fulfill some lofty goals this season.

Terps school UMass

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Classes may have started last week, but for the Massachusetts field hockey team, school wasn't truly in session until Sunday.

That's when the powerful Terrapins of Maryland stalked onto Richard F. Garber Field, and proceeded to give the Minutewomen a few lessons in championship-caliber hockey. And by the time the referee bell sounded, the Terps had handed UMass a humbling 7-0 defeat.

"We can learn a lot from this game," Coach Patty Shea said. "We now know what it takes to really work hard, compete, and win a game."

The Terps charged out hard from the opening whistle, using a blend of crisp passing and aggressive dribbling to beat the Maroon and White midfield and apply relentless pressure on UM goalkeeper Zowie Tucker. Maryland scoring leader Caroline Walter wasted little time zeroing in on the UMass net, sending a slap-shot at the Welsh native that required one of her trademark kick-saves to turn away. Terp back Molly Kauffman nearly scored on the put-back, striking the cross bar just to the left of the bewildered Tucker.

The scoring would open a mere two minutes later, when Maryland's Rachel Hiskins tucked away a loose ball unassisted after the Terps' second penalty corner. The Minutewomen tried anxiously to find their rhythm, but a wild clear by UMass midfielder Tracy Koch and a dynamic speed by Kauffman led to another flurry in front of the UMass net. Walter would not be denied a second time, redirecting a shot from Carla Tagliente past Tucker at the 21:43 mark to push the Terp lead to two.

"Maryland is a very, very good team; they move and work very well together," Shea said. "They were out there working for each other, instead of trying to do it individually."

Tagliente's assist pushed the New York native into a tie for eighth-place on the Terps' career scoring list with 91 points. She needs only one more assist to crack the school's top-ten in that category.

Zowie Tucker

Forward Kristen Schmidt provided one of the few first-half bright spots for the Minutewomen, using her stellar stickhandling to beat a number of Terp traps.

Maryland seemed to come out even stronger in the second half, as Walter showed her defensive prowess with a breathtaking steal from fellow German Anke Bruemmer. A botched Terp penalty corner at the 51:04 mark left the ball loose on the turf just to the right of the UMass goal, where Walter had to actually evade one of her own players before putting home her second goal of the afternoon.

Erika Whiston

UMass hardly had time to regroup, as Tagliente followed up a miss by Autumn Walsh with the Terps' fourth goal a mere three minutes later. Massachusetts native Dina Rizzo then came up with a highlight-reel score, a diving re-direct of a Carol Seikler shot that staked the Terp lead to five. Shea then saw an opportunity to insert a number of her younger players into the game, to cut their teeth against one of the nations finest programs.

Freshmen Sarah Bohmowicz, Sue Jackson, Iryna Napolitano, and Erika Whiston all saw significant playing time and made a definite impact on the UMass effort.

"The younger players came in and did a great job," Shea said. "They played hard, and competed for every ball."

Athol native Whiston gave the UMass fans a taste of great things to come, using her outstanding speed and reach to beat a pair of Terp defenders and launch the Maroon and White's only shot on goal with 19:06 to play. Following another score by Hiskins, Maryland showed off some of its young superstars when freshman Angie Klingerman scored on an assist from fellow first-year player Carli Harris to close the scoring at the 10:07 mark.

There was a two-ply silver lining for the Minutewomen in defeat: Tucker racked up 14 saves in the loss, while Maryland came up empty on 14 penalty corners. And as Shea was quick to point out, the experience of playing a national powerhouse like Maryland should pay serious dividends down the road for the Minutewomen.

"We needed to play a team like this to see how we stack up," Shea said. "Now we know where we can go, and where we need to go, from here."

game. We kept it simple a lot of times when we should have been able to terminate a little better. Seton Hall came out a stronger in the third game and had a lot of blocks," said Coach Bonnie Kenny of the match.

UM capped off the first day of the tournament 2-0 as they defeated the University of New Hampshire, 15-6, 15-12, 15-4. UMass started out with an 8-2 lead, assisted by UNH's three hitting errors. The Minutewomen went on to amass an eight-point lead before taking the game. The second game saw the women struggle but maintain a lead throughout winning by three. Game three's first point wasn't scored until the tenth serve when UMass broke it open with a 10-2 run.

Hogancamp and sophomore Janeen Demarte each registered double-doubles in the win with 11 kills, 14 digs and 12 kills, 14 digs, respectively. Sophomore Heather Holtsberg turned in a standout performance at setter, tallying 44 assists. Meyers showed her experience with a team high 18 kills, along with nine digs.

The third match of the tournament saw UMass sweeping their opponent, Southern Mississippi in three straight games, 15-9, 15-13, 15-4. The Minutewomen were in command for the majority of game one before capturing the opener. The Golden Eagles came out strong in game two to lead their hosts 7-2. Then, the UMass bomb squad went off on an explosive 11-0 tear before taking the game. UMass continued to impress, posting a ten point advantage putting them away on three straight hitting errors by Southern Miss.

Demarte hit her way to her second consecutive double-double with 12 kills and 12 digs. Hogancamp again played steady, just falling short of her third double-double of the tournament, registering 10 kills and 9 digs.

"I think I played really hard today. Our whole team worked hard. I'm certainly playing at a completely different level than I did last year and with a much higher confidence level right now," said Demarte of her performance.

In the final match of the tournament, Hogancamp sniped her way into the history books with her 1,000th career kill becoming the third player in UMass history to record both 1,000 kills and 1,000 digs. Unfortunately, the record was bitter sweet, as UM dropped three straight games to the Michigan State Spartans, 15-5, 15-12, 15-11.

In the opening game, the Spartans, came out gunning with a 6-0 rolls and remained solid to pick up the win. Undeterred, the Minutewomen fought their way to a 7-6 mid-game lead in the second. However MSU recaptured the lead 8-7 and battled through three straight points before putting UM away. Again, the Spartans started early with a 4-0 lead in the third game until UMass took control at 10-8. Undaunted, State proved too powerful, as they went on to win the game and the match.

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): What does a restless Virgo do? Sometimes simply worry, worry, and worry. But, what a useless way to spend a day of rest. If it's money that's on your mind (and possibly on your partner's as well), work off that mood by working on your checkbook and your budget.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): If you aren't cheerful today, it's not the planets' fault. There is an aura of friendliness and camaraderie all around you. If you haven't seen senior family members in a while, share your mood with them by phone or better yet, pay a visit.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Don't make any major changes today, though such thoughts could be on your mind. It's wise to lie low, with mate or partner, if that is your lot in life. Spend the time together quietly. Listen to the days and into the evening; you should feel the uplift of the Moon moving into your sign. For the next few days, you will be more confident. You'll be able to think productively about what it is that you want to make different.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Today is not a day to hang around and brood about the fact that the weekend is almost over. Most Sagittarians will feel an upswing in their social lives anyway. If no one else offers, make your place the spot for friends to gather later today.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): What kind of exercise agrees with you best? If you are typical of your sign, you may answer with dancing. That's because it's a great way to limber up and shed some calories while at the same time having a ball with mate or partner, or whoever really turns you on.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Let partnered Aquarians, things on the home front could definitely be looking up. Some recent conflicts are getting resolved, so the two of you should be seeing eye-to-eye more than you have of late. If you are solo, and simply wish you had someone to fight with, call up an office pal and see if he or she knows someone who is available.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20): A little self-examination never hurt anyone, least of all you. No matter what else you accomplish today, you should be able to gain some insight into who you have been so bugged about certain things in your life.

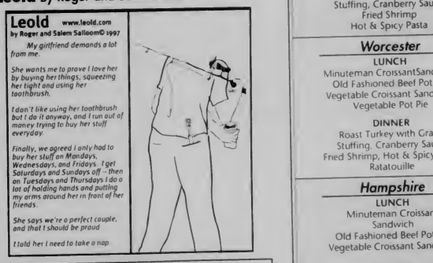
Aries (March 21-April 19): Hop, skip, jump - do whatever you must to shake off that slight case of the blahs you may feel in the early hours. It is only temporary. Though a general aura of cooperation surrounds you, an unspoken conflict may need airing.

Taurus (April 20-May 20): Those great new fall styles have been in the stores for a while, yet you haven't indulged yourself.

Today is an excellent day to get yourself to the mall and start trying them on. You bring you, any shopping experience is recreational in the best sense of the word.

Gemini (May 21-June 20): Gemini's idea of leisure is rather special. Relaxation often means keeping both your mind and your hands busy. Today, you could relax and achieve practical results as well. You may take a look at whatever garden space you have and decide that it is a disaster.

Cancer (June 21-July 22): A snag in your well-laid plans is not the disaster it feels like at first. For instance, a get-together you've been looking forward to may get canceled. Solve the problem by moving the party to your place, and knock off a bunch of social obligations while you are at it.



Leo (July 23-Aug. 22): Vim, vigor, and vitality are yours today. You may be gearing up for a possible move. If you know where it is you want to be, do some negotiating to get the price within the possible range. If that's not your current situation, use your energy by taking your exercise routine to the next level.

Zullo, defense tame Wildcats as football rolls

Bankhead gets all-time passing record with 38 TDs

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Last Saturday's game against Rhode Island was supposed to determine whether or not New Hampshire would win a game this season. With all-galaxy running back Jerry Azumah having graduated as Division I college football history's all-time leading rusher, the Wildcat offense looked suspect and average at best.

They knocked off the Rams and came to Amherst on Saturday for a more accurate gauge of where 1999 would take them.

On the flipside of things, the Massachusetts football team was the national champion, gearing up for another run at the crown with a home date against a team that most considered would bring up the rear in the race to the Atlantic 10 conference peak. Deservedly so, the Minutemen savored their triumph while they could, but one thing was made quite apparent this weekend at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

UMass will have to win with defense.

The Minutemen began the protection of their title by knocking off the Wildcats, 34-19, much thanks to a suffocating defense that kept a fiery offense at bay for three quarters before putting it in cruise control.

Leading the way was junior linebacker Kole Ayi, who stepped in for Khari Samuel at the middle linebacker position. A year after registering 21 tackles against the Wildcats, the New Hampshire native who was lightly recruited by former UNH coach Bill Bowes, came up with 16 to lead the team.

Throughout the first half of play, the Wildcats strung together long, time-consuming drives that had the Minutemen on their heels before quarterback Ryan Day and the New Hampshire offense stalled. Day threw four interceptions early in the game before settling down in the fourth quarter.

"We knew we were going to get our hands on it," noted Jerard White, who intercepted a pair of passes on the day. "Coach Whip and coach [Don] Brown keep telling us we have to finish."

After a lackluster first quarter from both offensive squads, it seemed as though the Minuteman offense sorely missed Jimmy Moore, Kerry Taylor and Matt Jordan, three seniors that accounted for nearly 3,000 receiving yards last season. At day's end, they had themselves a potential long-term resolution.

With 1:39 left in the third quarter, quarterback Todd Bankhead found Adrian Zullo from three yards out to make the score 34-3. It was the sophomore's fourth touchdown reception on the afternoon, equaling Moore's four score output last season at Connecticut.

Zullo started his career day out with 13:25 left in the second quarter. With the game still scoreless, the Minutemen found the end zone when Todd Bankhead rolled right and threw left to a wide open Zullo from 21 yards out. The connection capped an eight play, 58-yard drive that was set up by a Jeremy Robinson interception.

New Hampshire got to within four at the 9:34 with a 20-yard field goal by UNH's Peter Carbonara. Just two minutes later, it was Zullo for the second time, a 33-yard connection that gave the Minutemen a 14-3 lead. Bankhead, who threw for 227 yards on the day, found a streaking Zullo on the right sideline. Zullo evaded a pair of UNH defenders before plunging in for the score.

Number three came with just 22 seconds left in the second quarter when Zullo scored from 22 yards out on a pass from Bankhead to close out the first half with a 21-3 lead.

"He's a good player," UNH cornerback Mike Szweda said. "We blew a couple coverages, made some mental mistakes and he just capitalized on it."

In the final frame, Day began to find the touch on his passes in attempt to bring the Wildcats back. Day hit Kamau Peterson on the left sideline, a 30-yard strike that cut the lead to 34-11. The sophomore tossed a 10-yard touchdown pass to Randal Williams that all of a sudden put the Wildcats within striking distance with just over seven minutes left.

At the 4:29 mark and within two possessions, UNH got the ball at their own 15-yard-line hoping to make it a one-score game. The UMass defense buckled down, forcing the Wildcats to turn it over on downs.

Although Marcel Shipp rumbled for 145 yards, he needed 35 carries to do so.

Things to keep in mind about UMass football so far:

The more things change, the more they stay the same. Despite climbing to a 34-3 lead over New Hampshire, the Massachusetts football team let things get interesting, finally winning 34-19.

During their 1998 National Championship campaign, the Minutemen could always be counted on to play an exciting game, regardless of how much they scored right off the bat.

Nine times last year, UMass saw the outcome of its games decided within the last minute of the game or overtime. Against the Wildcats, in fact, the Champs watched a 20-6 advantage turn into a near-loss, 27-26.

With the final score coming to rest at 34-19, it was clear that Massachusetts was able to stop the bleeding before things got out of hand.

DAN TANTILLO/ COLLEGIAN

The UMass defense was solid in its first effort of the season.

Like a broken record...

For the second straight season, UMass Coach Mark Whipple watched the school single game record for touchdown catches attained. Last year, senior Jimmy Moore grabbed four scores in a single game and set the standard. In the season opener, heir apparent Adrian Zullo took four of his five catches into the end zone to tie the mark. The showing earned him the honor of Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week and the Bill Knight Award, given to the Most Valuable Player in the UMass/UNH game.

With eight tallies last year, the Floridian has 12 all-time, good for sixth place in school history.

It's not the first time the 5-foot-7 speedster began the year with a bang, though. Last year, in his first season, Zullo surprised Delaware with 208 total yards, the most ever in a Massachusetts opener.

Volleyball wins 3 out of 4

By James Piehl & Seth Szilagyi

It was a successful weekend, as the UMass volleyball team improved their 0-3 record to 3-4, as they easily dropped Seton Hall, New Hampshire, and Southern Mississippi but found Michigan State too strong in the Motorola Invitational this weekend.

The women started off the weekend against the Pirates of Seton Hall University. UM ravaged the Hall, 15-4,15-7,15-12. The Minutewomen established control of the match early on, as they had the advantage for the majority of the game. In the second game, UMass was down 2-0 when they quickly overcame the deficit to leap to an 11-5 lead and take the game. The Pirates gunned to a 5-2 lead early in the third, but with the help of senior Kari Hogancamp's two aces Mass rattled off eight straight points posting a 10-5 advantage. Seton Hall put together a mini rally of their own, scoring five straight pushing UMass to a mere three-point lead, before Hogancamp closed the door with a match-ending kill.

Hogancamp led the way with a double-double, boasting 16 kills and 14 digs with four aces. Senior Jill Meyers chipped in 11 kills and seven digs, while junior Rebecca Hasson tallied 6 blocks.

"I thought we did some good things today. Kari had a great game and really kept us in the offensive

Water polo continues to dominate NE

By Matt Bencal and Shana Orczyk

The Massachusetts men's water polo team dominated the Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) northern division tournament in Amherst, sweeping all four matches. Ranked 13th in the country by the CWPA, there was no scent of upset as the 7-1 Minutemen defeated Harvard, Boston College, Brown, and M.I.T.

Led by the defense of senior co-captain Richard Huntley in the net, the Minutemen held their opponents to only 25 points over the four matches. Offensively, the Minutemen were led by sophomore Mike Foley, who finished with a team high 11 goals, six of which came against Harvard. Senior Pat Kain (7 points) and sophomore Adam Moore (8 points) also had big weekends, finishing the tournament with a combined 15 points.

Pat Kain

Adam Moore

On Saturday morning, the Minutemen faced a tough Harvard squad. The game remained close until the second quarter, when the Minutemen pulled away with five unanswered goals.

Foley led the attack with help from Moore and senior Timmy Troupis, defeating the Crimson 14-5.

In the following contest UMass defeated Boston College 22-6, outscoring the Eagles 13-4 in the first half. The Minutemen kept the pressure on in the second half outscoring the Eagles 9-2.

Foley continued his outstanding performance by firing four goals to the back of the net, while Kain added three of his own. Freshman backup goalie Rafael Santana added a nice performance with 10 saves.

The Maroon and White destroyed Brown University in the late game, Saturday, 25-9. Foley, Kain and Moore maintained their domination of tournament, tallying five goals each. Huntley was strong in goal with 14 saves. With the win, UMass added another "W" to their 20-15 all-time record against the Bears.

The tournament concluded Sunday morning with a 12-5 Minuteman victory over M.I.T. led by the offense of youngsters Ricardo Puig, Dan Anderson and Brady Hahn. UMass continued their unparalleled history posting their 23 win against only two losses all-time against M.I.T. Engineers.

UMass is off to a great start this season, and will be looking to add another Eastern championship banner to their collection. If this weekend was any indicator of what the future may hold, the Massachusetts water polo community is in for an exciting ride.

Next weekend the Minutemen will travel down to New Jersey to compete in the Princeton tournament.

Scurry honored in soccer weekend

By Michael Kobylanski

It was the best of times and the worst of times for the Massachusetts women's soccer team this weekend.

The good news was that the Minutewomen squeezed out a 1-0 win over the University of Alabama-Birmingham on Saturday afternoon at Totman Field. Additionally, former UMass great Briana Scurry was honored at the contest for her efforts in leading the United States National Team to the Women's World Cup.

Yesterday afternoon, however, the Minutewomen squandered a 1-0 lead with 30 minutes to play and fell to Texas Christian University 2-1. With the split, UMass drops to 2-1-1 on the season.

"We just weren't physically fit to play back to back games on Saturday and Sunday," said UMass Coach Jim Rudy following the TCU contest. "I think that when you start to go physically, your thinking and decision making goes with it."

After UMass and the Horned Frogs played to a scoreless first half, the Minutewomen struck first to take a 1-0 lead. A TCU defender failed to clear a hall out of the box, and sophomore Kristi Rohicheau fired a shot towards the Horned Frogs goal. Her attempt was blocked, but it ended up right on the foot of Emma Kurowski, who buried her fourth goal of the season.

TCU [4-2] came back to knot the game seven minutes later on a goal by Alecia Grieshaber. The goal came off a free kick that was taken by Sherry Dick. UMass keeper Cori Stevens made the original save, but Grieshaber put home the rebound.

"When we defend restarts there are things that people have to do, and we didn't get them done," Rudy said. "They had numbers at the back post and we didn't deal with it. No

UMass men split two contests

The Massachusetts men's soccer team split two games this weekend to level out at 3-3 on the young season.

The Minutemen were supposed to play host to Maine on Friday night, but nature would have its say in delaying their success. The game with the Black Bears was changed to Saturday, a contest in which UMass came out on top 2-0.

Adam Black and Kyle Biedenbach each scored a goal against Maine to help propel UMass to its third straight victory. Todd Baron and Jonathan Bibb each added an assist in the winning effort.

Baron set up Black's goal at the 28:15 mark to give UMass an early 1-0 lead. Then, early in the second half, Bibb connected with Biedenbach to stake the Minutemen to a two-goal lead.

Senior goalkeeper Todd Fowler made six saves to earn the shutout for the Minutemen.

UMass dominated control during the game, outshooting the Black Bears 18-7.

The next day the Minutemen hosted New England power Boston University at Totman Field. The game was evenly matched practically the entire way, but the visiting Terriers got two later goals to take home a 2-0 victory.

The loss to the Boston school extinguished the three-game winning streak for the Minutemen. UMass had defeated Georgia State, Hartford and Maine in succession to bump its record to 3-2 on the season. The Minutemen had dropped its first two games of the year to New Hampshire and Jacksonville before starting its three-game roll of solid soccer.

Next up on the slate for the Minutemen will be the UMass Classic, which will be held at Totman Field this weekend. The University of Washington, Hartford and Siena College will make up the four-team field along with the Minutemen.

UMass will play Siena in its first game of the weekend on Friday afternoon at 4 p.m. before squaring off with the Washington Huskies on Sunday at 1 p.m.

Following the UMass Classic, the Maroon and White will open up their Atlantic 10 schedule. The A-10 opener will take place on September 25 in Kingston, Rhode Island when the Minutemen take on URI.

Jessica Osit, the Resident Director of Gorman/Wheeler, spoke yesterday about the racist graffiti found on the walls of Gorman residence hall.

Gorman's graffiti concerns students

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Graffiti written on the walls of Gornan Residence Hall over the weekend prompted an open forum to discuss solutions for dealing with discrimination on campus.

The incident occurred between late Saturday night and early Sunday morning and involved the writing of racial slurs and sexist remarks targeted at certain individuals and groups of students. Three floors were affected.

More than 100 students attended the meeting to express their discontent over the incident and to reach a decision on what actions will be taken. Jessica Osit, residence director of Gorman/Wheeler, said it is unfortunate students are being faced with an offensive act so early in the semester.

"It outrages me that we are being faced already with an issue like this," Osit said. "We're asking the students what we are going to do so we can make it clear that this kind of behavior is not tolerable in our community."

At the forum, UMass Police Detective Peter Murray discussed the consequences of acts involving racial remarks and destruction of public space.

According to Murray, an act that involves a threat towards an individual's safety or one that involves bodily harm can lead towards a minimum sentence of 10 years. Murray said an act involving racial graffiti on walls could hold an individual in contempt for a minimum of two and a half years in prison.

But many students are more concerned with finding out the motive behind such an act. According to junior Juliete Okafor, many students like herself were attracted to Gorman because it offers the Nuance program, a program aimed at multicultural learning.

"My first reaction was to go and see it," Okafor said. "I couldn't believe why someone would write it.

"For the first time in my life, I've seen action taken that has stripped me of everything I have in Gorman," Okafor said. "Whoever wrote it is ignorant."

Other students such as senior communications major Ainka Clepper agreed with Okafor and said they no longer felt safe in their dorms and that something should be done about it.

"This type of racism and discrimination threatens our immediate safety, moral safety and comfort," Clepper said. "There's no place here for people who want to harm others. You shouldn't have to open your door in the morning and see this on the walls."

Senior Salwa Shamapande feels the University has not addressed the issue of diversity, even after questions were raised about affirmative action policy last semester.

"All the RA [Resident Assistant] training in the world cannot stop what happened," Shamapande said. "I don't feel like diversity is a part of this education. It's just an add-on word."

Plans are being discussed for a future task force to help deal with incidents that involve racial vandalism in dorms. Students would like to help form a program called, "Not In Our Building" to vocally express to the community opposition to discrimination in dorms.

According to the UMass Police Log, two other incidents involving vandalism and racial slurs were reported over the weekend in Field Residence Hall.

Meanwhile, the graffiti on the walls of Gorman is covered up, but students are still feeling the repercussions.

APD cracks down on alcohol

$7,500 grant to be spent on prevention and enforcement

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Correspondent

The Amherst Police Department had a busy weekend, arresting 21 University of Massachusetts students for various charges, including carrying an open container, noise, possession of a keg and disorderly conduct.

The major arrest, at 12:45 a.m. Sunday, saw seven students who lived in at 635 Main Street in Amherst arrested for possession of a keg and a noise violation after police broke up a 150-person party at the residence.

The arrests are part of an attack on alcohol being lead by the Amherst Police Department. According to Jeff Roy, an Amherst Police Department Lieutenant, the attack is being funded in part from a $7,500 grant to the town of Amherst from the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau. The rest of the money will come from the police department's funds.

"The money we're spending is going for alcohol enforcement, partly towards prevention, but mostly for enforcement," Roy said. "The grant will be spent to encourage a zero-tolerance policy on alcohol, which includes the Cops in Shops program, and also the speed/alcohol prevention (SAP) program."

The Cops in Shops program is designed to get officers into package stores so as to prevent the purchase of alcohol by those under the legal limit.

Roy described that teams of two officers will go to a package store, and one will pose as a clerk, while the other will stand outside in plain clothes. The officer inside watches for fake IDs or underage buyers, and the officer outside watches for "shouldertapping."

"We're going to do a similar thing in Amherst with the bars, same as we do with the liquor stores," Roy said, adding that the Amherst Police Department wants to get the word out to college students that officers will be a presence at liquor vending locations.

"And those locations are going to vary," Roy said. "We've have full compliance from the stores who want to avoid a fine for selling liquor to those who are underage, and with that compliance, there is going to be less possibility of charges or arrests."

Roy added that all nine package stores in Amherst have readily complied with Cops in Shops, explaining that the stores face fines if they sell alcohol to minors, so a program that would prevent such sales is well received.

And the stores, at least some of them, admit to liking the program. Spirit Haus Manager Laurie Doubleday admitted that the store had been fined in the past for selling alcohol to minors.

"This is going to be the second fall that we've done this," Doubleday said. "I don't know if the officers deter people, because I'm not sure what the kids know about it, but I at least hope these kinds of programs would deter people."

She went on to say that stores like hers used to take the blame for people falsifying their IDs while those people "are hardly punished."

"This takes the pressure off us knowing they'll be punished," Doubleday said.

At Russell's Package Store, owner Bill Russell says that he's never had a problem with youth purchasers.

"We always have ownership working," Russell said. "We don't have bouncers, or hired help, so we don't run into those problems. We are notorious for selling only to those over 21 and that's how I like it."

But Russell said that he liked the police department's program.

"Those officers are pretty good," Russell said. "They try to educate people rather than just lurking in the dark, so these officers let people know that they're going to get them."

The officers are also working to get speeders. The Amherst Police Department is setting up radar sites around town trying to, as Roy put it, "detect operators under the influence."

"It's going to happen on various nights throughout the fall, primarily on weekends," Roy said. "We started this particular program in the early 80's after 13 people died in alcohol related incidents in one year, but we're still trying to reinforce the alcohol laws in terms of driving."

And everything, according to Roy, is going to vary.

"Some nights we'll spend two hours at Russell's and two hours somewhere else," Roy said. "And some nights we'll watch for speeders in one place and then watch for them somewhere else."

Yeltsin condemns terrorist blasts

By David Hoffman
Washington Post

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin, saying that "terrorism has declared war on us," declared Monday that the authorities would take "tough, swift and decisive" action following the third major apartment house bombing in nine days, but stopped short of imposing a national emergency.

The blast at No. 6 Kashirskoye Highway struck with deadly efficiency at 5 a.m., destroying the eight-floor brick building completely. As of Monday night officials said 49 people were dead but dozens more were feared lost under the rubble. Authorities said 142 people lived in the building and about 30 had not been home at the time of the blast. The building was located south of Moscow, about four miles from another apartment building where an explosion last week killed 94 people.

The blast came on a national day of mourning for victims of the earlier explosions.

Rescue workers raced to find survivors in the pre-dawn darkness but there were few. Most of the injured were in neighboring buildings hit by flying debris. Rain and dust hampered their efforts to dig under the tons of smoldering rubble.

Authorities said the blast was the result of a bomb apparently planted on the first floor. They were looking for a man who they said had rented space in both Moscow buildings hit by bombs. In a third case, on Sept. 4, a car bomb exploded in the troubled region of Dagestan, killing 64 people, mostly families in a military officers' barracks.

Atrocities continue in East Timor

By Doug Struck and Keith B. Richburg
Washington Post

KUPANG, Indonesia — Jani thought he was safe on the ferry. After three days of terror in East Timor, the boat would take him and two college friends to refuge, he thought.

Then the militiamen boarded. No young men may leave East Timor, they announced as the boat prepared to depart. Jani, 27, tried to hide; the militiamen caught his friends. "Are there any others?" the militia demanded. Jani recalls. "No, no other young men," replied his friends in a last gift of kindness.

They marched Amando Gomez, 29, and Armando DiSilva, 30, to the front of the boat and killed them before 200 refugees. Gomez's body was dumped in the sea; DiSilva's on the ground by the dock.

Jani raced through the boat. "Please help me," he whispered to the other refugees. A mother motioned to him to hide between her and her children. The searching militiamen walked by.

The account of Jani, now a fearful refugee in western Timor, adds to the mounting evidence that victims of the murderous rampage in East Timor following the territory's overwhelming vote for independence from Indonesia were systematically culled from the others.

Young men, political opponents, Roman Catholic clergy and anyone else suspected of favoring the independence opposed by the militias were targeted, in a chilling echo of the techniques of systematic killing seen in Kosovo.

In the capital, Jakarta, on Monday the top U.N. official for human rights said she had gathered consistent and credible evidence that members of the Indonesian armed forces and police engaged in a "well-planned and systematic policy of killings, displacement, destruction of property and intimidation" that could lead to prosecution before an international tribunal.

The right to bare arms

I sincerely wish you could see this.

The 'this' in question is a ripped-out ad that I found in the very depths of my drawer as I was packing to move back to good old Amherst. Evidently I was either a very perverted young man (the most likely option), or I had already known at a younger age that I would be writing a humor column in college and had laid this aside just so I'd have material. But either way, this is the greatest thing in the known universe. As you may have figured out by now, this ad is for nothing else but the world-famous 'Guns 'n Babes 1999 & 2000 Calendar.'

Rob Schultze

Ohhhh yes, you heard me right. For $12.95 and three bucks shipping you are promised nothing less than "24 Full Color Photos of Exotic Babes with Exotic Guns." Exotic babes. Exotic guns. Somebody pinch me.

The full flavor of this ad cannot be conveyed by the written word. In addition to the sample pictures (which I will decently leave up to your imagination), you must mail your order to a town in Oregon by the name of (drum roll) Beaverton. Allow me to repeat that just once more: Beaverton.

I'm sorry, I can't – it's too easy. You're a college student. You make up your own Beaverton double entendre.

Now, this would all be in fun if it weren't for the upper right corner of this ad where, in grim boldface letters, it is written "YK2: Be prepared!" I don't know about you, but that worried me. I've never even heard of YK2, but if the fine producers of the Guns 'n Babes calendar (whom you have to assume are upstanding members of the Republican Party) are concerned about it, then common saps like me or you should have every reason to be terrified.

I mean, think about it. There are very few things in this world that cannot be defeated by either 1) babes, 2) guns, or 3) a combination of the two. Let's look at this rationally. Babes defeat religion. Trust me on this one: ask any non-virgin Catholic who happens to not be married. Guns defeat bears. This is proven conclusively in the John Candy movie The Great Outdoors. Babes and guns defeat the need for sleep, as demonstrated in independent research done involving me, the eighth grade, and late-night Cinemax. If the good people of Beaverton have this kind of power at their disposal and are still worried about YK2, then Lord only knows what this disaster has in store for the rest of us.

I knew then what my mission was. If you, my beloved reader, were going to be placed in danger by something of this magnitude, then I was going to have to do something about it. I was going to use all the skills I learned in my Journalism classes to dig out the information, uncover the truth, and blow this story up, in the process saving thousands, nay, millions of lives.

It was my duty.

Of course, then I remembered that all the Journalism classes I wanted that were overenrolled yet again, so I had no skills with which to save you. Sorry. Take it up with whoever decided that no teachers is a positive thing at a University. Since I suddenly had all this free time cleared up, I just followed the ad's advice and went to www.guns-n-babes.com.

I wish to assure you that this is an actual functioning website and you should all go there immediately. (Don't use my name.) Although I could find no more info on the YK2 scourge (just listen for the screams – then you'll know), I did find several mpegs of women in bikinis firing automatic weapons and jiggling in unnatural ways. In the photo gallery the girls weren't even wearing bikinis, if you catch my drift, although they do clutch the shotguns rather firmly. I haven't seen such a blatantly phallic insinuation since the steam pipe in front of Van Meter.

You can also click on the 'Babes of GNB' section, which features bios of the various, uh, babes. For reasons that you Playstation owners will identify with, I chose a girl named Lara to get to know better. It turns out that Lara is a very cerebral girl with arm freckles, 36-24-34 measurements, and turn-ons which include 'Carrying a Glock.' Her turnoff is (you will not believe this!) small toasters. Seriously. She just 'goes ballistic' when she can't fit her whole bagel in there. I can totally understand where she's coming from here – when I can't cram a whole box of Toaster Strudel into an E-Z Bake Oven, I occasionally whip out my AK and pop the little bastard to Kingdom Come. But that's just me.

Next week's adventure: Rob stumbles onto the "Studs with Stabbing Implements" website and is never the same again.

Lampshades: The conspiracy exposed

I am very glad to live in a country where weird, wacky and all-together-crazy people have the same amount of say in the government as the rest of us "normal" folks. My aunt enjoys making lampshades, which does not make her crazy, but it does make her a little closer to crazy than the rest of us. To construct these lamp-topping wonders she needs supplies, and she has been getting them from the same woman for the last ten years or so. For the last ten years she has gone to the same store and dealt with the same lady without incident. Then, a few weeks ago the "craft lady" threw my aunt a screwball.

While filling out her receipt (apparently the craft world has not bought into the whole cash register thing yet) she muttered, "You know that we are all living under Communism, don't you?" After computing what the woman had just said, my aunt was about to make like Carl Lewis for the door, but before she could leave, the crafty crafter handed her an information packet. I have since read the contents of that packet and I am as sure as the grass is green that "the craft lady" is a nut job.

Among the contents is a copy of Texe Marrs' "Power of Prophecy" newsletter. The top story in the newsletter is one about Bill Clinton secretly plotting a run at a third term of office. "A certain dark horse candidate is lurking around. And who is this scheming dark horse candidate? None other than William Jefferson Clinton!" Can you really picture Bill Clinton lurking anywhere? He's a bit too chunky to lurk – he could lumber, or even slink, but not lurk.

The other major story is one about the possibility of having a woman vice-president in the next election. One of the candidates that Texe brings to light is Diane Feinstein, a liberal senator from California. "Liberal Feinstein could be vaulted to the VP slot because she is Jewish, rabidly pro-Israel, a supporter of a global police state, a friend to gun-control radicals, and an abortion leader." WHEW! She is one hell of a busy lady, and frankly I am surprised that the people of California would elect someone in favor of "a global police state."

Brian Lohnes

The other major possibility according to Texe is Hillary Clinton. We get to see the real Texe when he talks about Hillary. "If Hillary gets the job, she and her lesbo-feminist girlfriends will continue to run the White House from behind-the-scenes, just as they do now in President Bill Clinton's administration." This guy is pretty far from being "politically correct" when describing Hillary and her friends as "lesbo-feminists". I don't know where Texe is getting his info, but he does claim some of it comes from the Virgin Mary. If this is true she has to watch her tongue while talking to prophets. Those bastards print everything.

Another page in the packet is entitled "How the IRS Controls Christian Churches". I was completely unaware that the IRS (the Internal Revenue Service) was able to control the First Amendment as it pertains to Christian Churches, but I guess you learn something new every day. The IRS, as Texe describes it, seems to be run by a bunch of big, evil, devil worshippers. These devil-worshipping accountants have seized control of the IRS and seemingly altered the Constitution all the while stripping Christian Churches the ability to (and I am not lying) "expose conspiracies". Also Christian Churches are not allowed to "Expose or criticize the New Age Movement". What does this guy want to do, bust Yanni? There is a list of 35 things that Churches "can't do" here's a quick sample: (Christian Churches can't)

- "Express an opinion on any subject or issue"
- "Say anything positive about the religious right or the 'patriot movement'"
- "Criticize the Masonic Lodge, the Order of Skull and Bones, or other secret societies."
- "Expose false teachings of any kind"

Apparently the Masonic Lodge has become a force to be reckoned with. That or Texe was denied membership, because it makes no sense that Masons are even mentioned. In case everyone forgot, one of America's perks is the right to free speech. I would bet dollars to doughnuts that if the IRS really pulled any of this stuff on a church there would be about 10,000 lawyers licking their chops to get this case.

As I said in the beginning, I am glad to live in a place with people like Texe. He is using his right to free speech.

Unfortunately, he is crazy.

That isn't altogether bad though, because he is entertaining. This won't be the last time you read about a guy like Texe in this column. In fact, I tend to find a lot of oddball subjects to write about. So tune in next week for another dose of the weird, wacky, and slightly-off-center people and events that keep life interesting. Oh, and by the way, I will be taking lampshade orders all this semester. Just kidding, of course.

POW for president?

Should the hidden story of a POW be the leg that a presidential candidate stands on?

Presidential candidate John McCain suffered through 5 1/2 years of torture as a POW. On October 26, 1967, McCain was involved in a bombing mission over Hanoi. His A-4 fighter jet was shot down in Vietnam. Unfortunately, he was not able to safely eject himself and was knocked unconscious and broke both of his arms and his right knee.

For lack of a better word, luckily he landed in the True Back Lake in Hanoi, where he was retrieved, according to McCain, "by an angry group of Vietnamese".

Honorable prisoner that he was, he would not accept an offer of early release ahead of other prisoners. If he had chosen differently, he would have violated the honor code for captured servicemen. In turn, he would have embarrassed his country, his family, and himself. But after repeated beatings, McCain wrote and signed a bogus confession of his alleged crimes against the people of Vietnam, reported the Globe.

McCain now says that when he talks of his prison experiences he feels "bored stiff."

What surprises me about him being "bored stiff" when discussing his experiences is that it seems to be one of the main legs that he is standing on for his campaign. When he was released from Hanoi and returned to the United States, his speech told his story. He then kept quiet for 25 years.

Now he has begun to tell his story again. It seems like he was waiting for the perfect moment to re-release his truly upsetting experiences in Vietnam. Now that he is campaigning for the presidency, the perfect time has come.

Emily Vacanti

In addition to his verbal campaign, he has written a book, co-authored by his Senate administrative assistant Mark Salter, which he will be promoting during his campaign. In order to be co-author of this book, Salter had to ask McCain questions, which McCain had trouble answering.

Apparently McCain just did not want to talk about his experiences from 25 years ago. His decision to write the book was encouraged by the desire to tell the history of his father and grandfather. Both McCain's father and grandfather were four-star Navy admirals. He wanted to include them in his book where he retells his own story in the family's world, where a code of conduct, honor, and patriotism dictate behavior. His only problem with writing this book is that he hates talking about himself for the time being. He stated that he is embarrassed by it. He does not want to be labeled a hero because in his mind he failed while in prison. At the thought of being tortured repeatedly, he finally broke down.

"It seems like he was waiting for the perfect moment to re-release his truly upsetting experiences in Vietnam. Now that he is campaigning for the presidency, the perfect time has come."

In the book, McCain includes that he could find no way to rationalize his confession. He only confessed because he could not stand even the thought of being tortured. "I felt ashamed. I felt faithless, and couldn't control my despair. I shook, as if my disgrace were a fever." McCain said.

When McCain was interviewed for an earlier book, "John McCain: An American Odyssey" by Robert Timberg, he was said to be quite reluctant to say anything positive about himself or his actions. McCain was so reluctant to talk about different experiences that he barely responded, only answering "yes" or "no." Though fortunately McCain did start opening up. He talked about many stories that we hope are in his book. There, he neither shies away from the details of his past nor openly talks about them.

In 1982 McCain certainly did open up while running for Congress. He ended up stating that he had lived in Hanoi longer than he had lived in any other part of the world, and mainly because he had lived his life in the Navy. While in the Navy, one learns to live in all parts of the world. Living in the same place for 5 1/2 years was quite a change for McCain. After being elected to the House of Representatives in 1982, he moved up the ladder and was elected to the Senate in 1986.

So the only question left for me is whether to vote for McCain during the presidential elections. I am still going to listen to the debates and decide who I think will be the best president based on everything that I hear. Maybe McCain is using his experience as a POW as the main leg for his campaign. That is his choice. From what I hear, he is a very strong speaker with quite a quick and witty tongue. Only time will tell.

The Latest and Greatest of the Net

The latest Internet site rankings are in, and depending on whom you believe, AOL and Yahoo! are the two most visited sites on the Web.

Media Metrix says that Yahoo! (http://www.yahoo.com) is the most visited place on the Net. However, Nielsen, which also does T.V. ratings, ranks America On Line (http://www.aol.com) number one. Both sites had approximately 18.5 million people visit their respective sites for the week ending September 5th.

The two companies pretty much agree; when filling out the remainder of the top 10, Microsoft sites are fourth, followed by Lycos (http://www.lycos.com), Disney's Go network (http://www.go.com), Ebay, Real Networks' sites, Time Warner Online, and Altavista (http://www.altavista.com).

Generation "Y" sites are also on the rise. Gaming sites like Ugo.net and Gamesville.com, as well as Ty.com (the official Beanie Baby site) and Disney Online (http://www.disney.com) were all on the Top Gainers list.

In a particularly interesting note, Nielsen reported that The Gap's website (http://www.gap.com) was the most popular site among women. A reported 86.6% of all their visitors were women. And Gamespot.com was the most popular site among males (85% of their visitors were male). The Conclusion? Men use computers to play games and women use them to shop.

A new challenge to the popular MP3 music format seems to be on the horizon. In the past couple of years, MP3's have grown exponentially in popularity, mostly because music files can now be encoded and passed along illegally to others for free. Mcy.com, the leading provider of digital music, has teamed with iPIN (http://www.ipin.com) to create a format that will be much more appealing to record labels and artists.

With the union between Mcy and iPIN, customers will be able to buy anything on the Net, including digital music, without having to use a credit card. Basically, MCY.com's encryption technology, calcld NETrax, tracks digital downloads to calculate and report any royalty payments, acting in the best interest of the label and artist.

How does it work? Well, members first set up an account with iPIN, then, are given a personal password to click and buy stuff on the Net. They use a personal password instead of a credit card, and the total at month's end is simply added to the customer's ISP (Internet Service Provider) bill.

By signing this agreement, Mcy.com hopes artists and major record labels will choose them, rather than the free MP3 format, to distribute music on the Net.

The ultimate football fan's experience is here. Buena Vista Internet Group and ABC is providing Enhanced TV coverage of 39 NFL games on ABC and ESPN this fall, including all regular season ABC's Monday Night Football and ESPN's Sunday Night Football telecasts and all post-season games on ABC, including Super Bowl XXXIV.

As a live production, Enhanced TV enables fans to access via their personal computers unique content that is synchronized with every ABC Sports and ESPN NFL telecast. The content is highly interactive, produced from a live control room and offers the user/viewer numerous customized offerings.

Adam Martinetti

The three main features are: PrimeTime Player, a live, interactive game enabling fans to compete against friends and other viewers throughout the country during the actual NFL telecast; 'Game Stats,' a continuously updated, real-time interactive database of game, player and team statistics originating from the production truck on-site at each game; and a 'Push Channel" of enhanced graphics to the telecasts.

PrimeTime Player allows fans to predict the ball handler before every play from scrimmage. Points are awarded for every correct choice, and fans can follow their progress on live leaderboards as they compete against thousands of other players nationwide. Players can create their own user groups to better keep score among friends. Throughout the telecast, interactive trivia questions, including 'watch-and-win" questions, will pop up on the users' screens. Bonus points will be awarded for correct answers and added to PrimeTime Players' scores.

However, one of Enhanced TV's major setback is that it comes with no audio or video feeds. The program is meant to be watched completely in conjunction with the regular game telecast. So, all those Sunday couch potatoes can move the monitor and keyboard in front of the TV and really have some fun.

Are you looking to buy something on the Net? Beware, you may be an unhappy customer. E-BuyersGuide.com, an online shopping guide, criticized e-tailers recently, saying that 48% were unsatisfied with the customer service that they had received from online outfits. In addition, almost one-quarter of the 700 surveyed said that they failed to receive a response to an e-mail requesting assistance.

The founders of the popular Webcaster, Imagine Radio, are being sued by MTV for violating non-compete agreements in their employment contracts. Rotem Perelmuter and Michael Briseno, the founders of Imagine Radio, are cited in a New York state lawsuit filed by MTV, which bought their company for $14.5 million in February. MTV accuses the men of planning to launch a competing online radio venture, using inside MTV information. Last month, MTV said it found, in Perelmuter's computer, a written presentation soliciting venture capital for this competing online radio site. He and Briseno had previously agreed to work two years for MTV, after the purchase of their company.

In a move to become more like a bank with walls, Netbank.com recently announced that they will provide online checking services. Customers will be able to view and order checks online, thanks to an agreement with Deluxe Corp.

Business consultant and author Tom Peters announced that he will use 90-minute video Webcasts and a live chat on Yahoo! to promote three of his new books. "New technologies are fueling a — no hype — once every 500 years revolution in the way we work. Those who can't adjust will perish," Peters exclaimed."

The video broadcasts will be available live and on-demand on Yahoo! Broadcast at Leadership.Broadcast.com.

Viacom-CBS deal threatens television quality

By David Zurawik
Baltimore Sun

With the rhetoric flying from all directions last week in the wake of Viacom buying CBS for $38 billion, it was not easy for viewers to understand what the transaction would mean to their lives.

Analysts called it a threat to our democratic way of life and the end of network television as we knew it," without saying who exactly we" were and what it was we knew."

The Viacom-CBS deal is a major development, but not a watershed moment in broadcasting history. Disney-ABC and Time Warner were watersheds because they took us into the super-conglomerate era of network television in which we now live. Viacom-CBS is the continuation of that trend, which experts say predicting will culminate in a Sony-NBC deal.

As University of Maryland media economist Douglas Gomery, who writes the Business of Television" column for American Journalism Review, put it: "NBC is the only network left without a major studio. Sony-NBC would be my pick for the next mega-deal. It almost has to happen at some point."

You don't need to be an economist to realize how such deals can change our culture. All you have to do is watch the new fall shows that the networks are starting to roll out.

You have probably already read that this crop of series from ABC, NBC, CBS, Fox, WB and UPN is the worst in recent memory. This is a direct result of relaxed federal regulations that allow the networks to own the shows they air. It's the first season in which the networks have produced the vast majority of new series themselves rather than buying them from independent producers like, say, Norman Lear or Steven Bochco.

"American viewers need to know this sorry group of shows this fall is the new look of network television thanks to the blockheads in Washington who allowed the networks to take control of production without the public ever knowing what was going on," said Stephen J. Cannell, an independent producer who has created more series and written more hours of television than anyone in Hollywood, with the possible exception of Lear and Bochco.

A former staff producer at Universal, where he wrote for and created such series as "The Rockford Files," "Baretta" and "The A-Team," Cannell was also one of the first writer-producers to own his own production company and studio. While he still has Stephen J. Cannell Productions, which makes television movies, he started writing novels full-time in the mid-1990s. He says he made the switch in part because the networks were starting to wrest control from independents by building their own production operations and looking to merge with major studios like Viacom's Paramount.

With four best-sellers in four years, a fifth book climbing the charts and more money from syndication than anyone should probably have, Cannell is not a bitter man. But he is an angry one - angry about the Federal Communications Commission letting Hollywood lobbyists seduce it into dropping the financial interest-syndication rules. These regulations, in place for 22 years, kept the networks from controlling both the production and the distribution of TV shows. That single act of deregulation in 1993 set loose the mega-merger beasts now on the rampage.

"I'm not mad at the networks. They're businesses run by businessmen. This is what they do. I ran a studio in Hollywood; I understand. I'm mad at the people in Washington, who are supposed to serve the public interest, but instead just let the networks take control of the airwaves and wipe out a system in Hollywood that resulted in some pretty good television for the American viewer," Cannell said.

The system of which Cannell speaks involved a constant tension between independent producers and the networks that bought their products. The best producers had a vision that aspired toward art, while the networks favored a more bland and predictable kind of show that better fit their idea of television as an assembly-line business.

Take "The Mary Tyler Moore Show." As co-creator Allan Burns tells it, CBS hated the episode titled "Support Your Local Mother," which introduced the character of Ida Morgenstern (Nancy Walker) as mother of Rhoda Morgenstern (Valerie

One of the things CBS objected to was the scene in which Ida first meets Mary. It is one of the funniest moments in one of television's funniest series. In it, Mary is "distressing" a table with a chain in an effort to make it look like an antique. Walker's facial reactions tell you she thinks Mary is crazy even as she says, "Whatever turns you on, dear."

The CBS executives thought it was "an S&M scene" when they read the script and, despite Burns' attempts to explain distressed furniture, cited it as one of the reasons CBS would not pay for the episode. In defiance, Grant Tinker, who was then running the fledgling MTM production company, OK'd the $100,000 cost of filming out of his own pocket - a move that would have nearly bankrupt MTM had CBS not finally caved in after they were handed the finished product.

Today, that episode would never get made and the character of Ida Morgenstern would probably never have gotten on screen.

I firmly believe that one of the reasons we have 27 new series from ABC, NBC, CBS and Fox this fall with no leading character whom black is that the networks controlled the production process so thoroughly for the first time.

This is not to say that the networks conspired to make it happen or even consciously wanted it to happen-only shows that fit a certain model got made this year. And, outside of a very few superstar producers - David E. Kelley, Dick Wolf and John Wells - you either made the shows the networks wanted in the way they wanted or found yourself without a buyer.

The unprecedented level of network control is also the reason for so many uninspired spin-off series this fall; spin-offs are safe and fit the network practice of not taking chances.

As for the larger claims about the Viacom-CBS merger, no one really knows what it all means. But I feel in my bones that Time-Warner, Disney-ABC and Viacom-CBS are not the proper media model for a democracy.

And it is plain to see that we are headed even further down that road in coming years. Only government can stand up to companies this large and powerful. And, sad to say, I don't see any trust-busters on the political horizon.

Secrets to Independent Success

John Pierson: The Maestro Of Little Movies (New York)

By David Daley
Hartford Courant

NEW YORK - Miramax's Harvey Weinstein has made himself the most visible face of independent film, with his extravagant Oscar campaigns for "The English Patient" and "Shakespeare in Love" and his bankrolling Talk magazine after stealing Tina Brown away from The New Yorker.

But those in the know consider John Pierson the real guru of indie film.

When Spike Lee needed $10,000 to finish his first feature, "She's Gotta Have It," Pierson wrote him the check. Michael Moore's film "Roger & Me" might have been bitingly anti-corporate, but Pierson sold it to Warner Bros. for $5 million.

Kevin Smith looked to Pierson as the "miracle man" who managed to get "Clerks" distributed when no one wanted to touch his low-budget, foul-mouthed film about New Jersey convenience-store workers. Richard Linklater's "Slacker" might never have been shown outside Austin, Texas, or become shorthand for describing "Generation X," if not for Pierson's support.

Even the buzz over the current indie-film blockbuster "The Blair Witch Project" was started by Pierson in 1997. Pierson aired two short segments of "Blair Witch" on "Split Screen," the show he hosts on the Independent Film Channel, and immediately stirred a "War of the Worlds"-styled tempest on the IFC Web site over whether it was a real documentary.

"Split Screen" had its premiere in 1997, as an outgrowth of Pierson's multimedia tour for his book "Spike, Mike, Slackers & Dykes: A Guided Tour Across a Decade of American Independent Cinema." Since then, there's been no better place to pick up the indie-film buzz. Last week, IFC celebrated its fifth anniversary with an hour long "Split Screen" retrospective; Monday, the fifth season of "Split Screen" began.

Chatting in the show's SoHo production office recently, aptly attired in a "Crumb" T-shirt, the bespectacled, curly-haired enthusiast - he got married at New York's Film Forum after showing friends a Buster Keaton comedy - said the show is taking a different approach this year.

If Pierson was once the Charlie Rose of IFC, inviting directors to talk about their new projects, now he hopes to be more like "60 Minutes" creator Don Hewitt, supervising a cast of correspondents.

"I hope it's a film-loving show, but it's almost equally about good stories and colorful characters doing unexpected things. It would be nice to see the show get a larger audience, because we're not making it for somebody who is desperate to get some inside look at Lili Taylor or Parker Posey," said Pierson, naming two indie-film It Girls. "They're great actresses, but that's not what we want to do here. We want to do stories that have more entertainment value."

So Pierson's especially excited about upcoming "Split Screen" features done by others. One is about a film-obsessed New Yorker who sees more than 1,000 movies a year, carefully indexing all of them. Another is on the Atlantic City, N.J., company that does almost all the building demolition seen on screen.

"Split Screen" contributors P.H. O'Brien and Doug Stone journeyed to Haley, Idaho, to report on what's new in the town Bruce Willis bought, then abandoned. Then, of course, Smith, of "Clerks," will certainly come on in November to discuss his controversial new "Dogma."

"I'm really keen on getting the right balance of stories," Pierson said. "There are people I'd love to see on the show. We have Atom Egoyan ("The Sweet Hereafter") coming up. But it's going to be less of 'The John Show.' There are fewer people left I really want to interview. Although there are still people that I never want on the show."

Such as?

"Oh, I couldn't name any names. I've already picked on Eric Stoltz far too much," Pierson says, dismissing the ubiquitous actor with a laugh. "And I'd Burns. You'll never see I'd Burns on 'Split Screen.' 'The Brothers McMullen' was bad news. It's so middle-of-the-road. It set off a wave of low-budget, mainstream romantic comedies. You would not believe how many people work in that genre now. There may be more of them than Gen X films."

Pierson hopes to give up-and-comers the chance to get their short films on IFC, helping them get the experience they need to make their feature debuts stand out in the crowd of indie films. After all, he points out, both "South Park" and "Sling Blade" started as shorts.

"His taste commands respect," said Christine Vachon, the executive producer of "Velvet Goldmine" and "Happiness." She first worked with Pierson 15 years ago on 1985's "Parting Glances," the first film to tackle the threat of AIDS, and the movie that gave Steve Buscemi his first leading role. "If John finds something and pushes it, he gets it noticed," she said.

The films that got their start with sneak previews on "Split Screen" include the documentary "Divine Trash" and this fall's hotly anticipated "American Movie." Two animators who got their break on his show then came to the attention of Richard Linklater and will be doing the animation for his next film. Then there's the pop-cult sensation "Blair Witch," whose creators credit Pierson for sparking the early excitement that led to a $100 million-plus take at the box office.

"The movie purports to be made by three people who never returned from an expedition into the Maryland woods to explore the legend of the Blair Witch. Their film supposedly was found a year later.

"We ran it as 'found footage' and got a really good response. The 'Split Screen' Web site exploded with people talking about whether it was real. That was our first real inclination of what might happen," said Daniel Myrick, who co-wrote and directed the film.

Pierson hopes "Blair Witch" restores some of the excitement to indie cinema, which he suggests has seemed a little tired of late. He's a little disappointed that his favorite film this year is a major studio picture, "The Matrix."

One of the reasons "Blair Witch" stands out is because it hasn't felt as if there's been a watershed film since "Pulp Fiction" and "Clerks" in 1994. Before that, the watershed was sex, lies and videotape' in 1989. Between '89 and '94, you had an incredible body of work: Todd Haynes, Hal Hartley, Carl Franklin.

In the five years since "Pulp Fiction," I haven't had the same sense of overall hustling excitement."

The English Patient's Ralph Fiennes and Kristin Scott Thomas share Oscar fame of yesteryear.

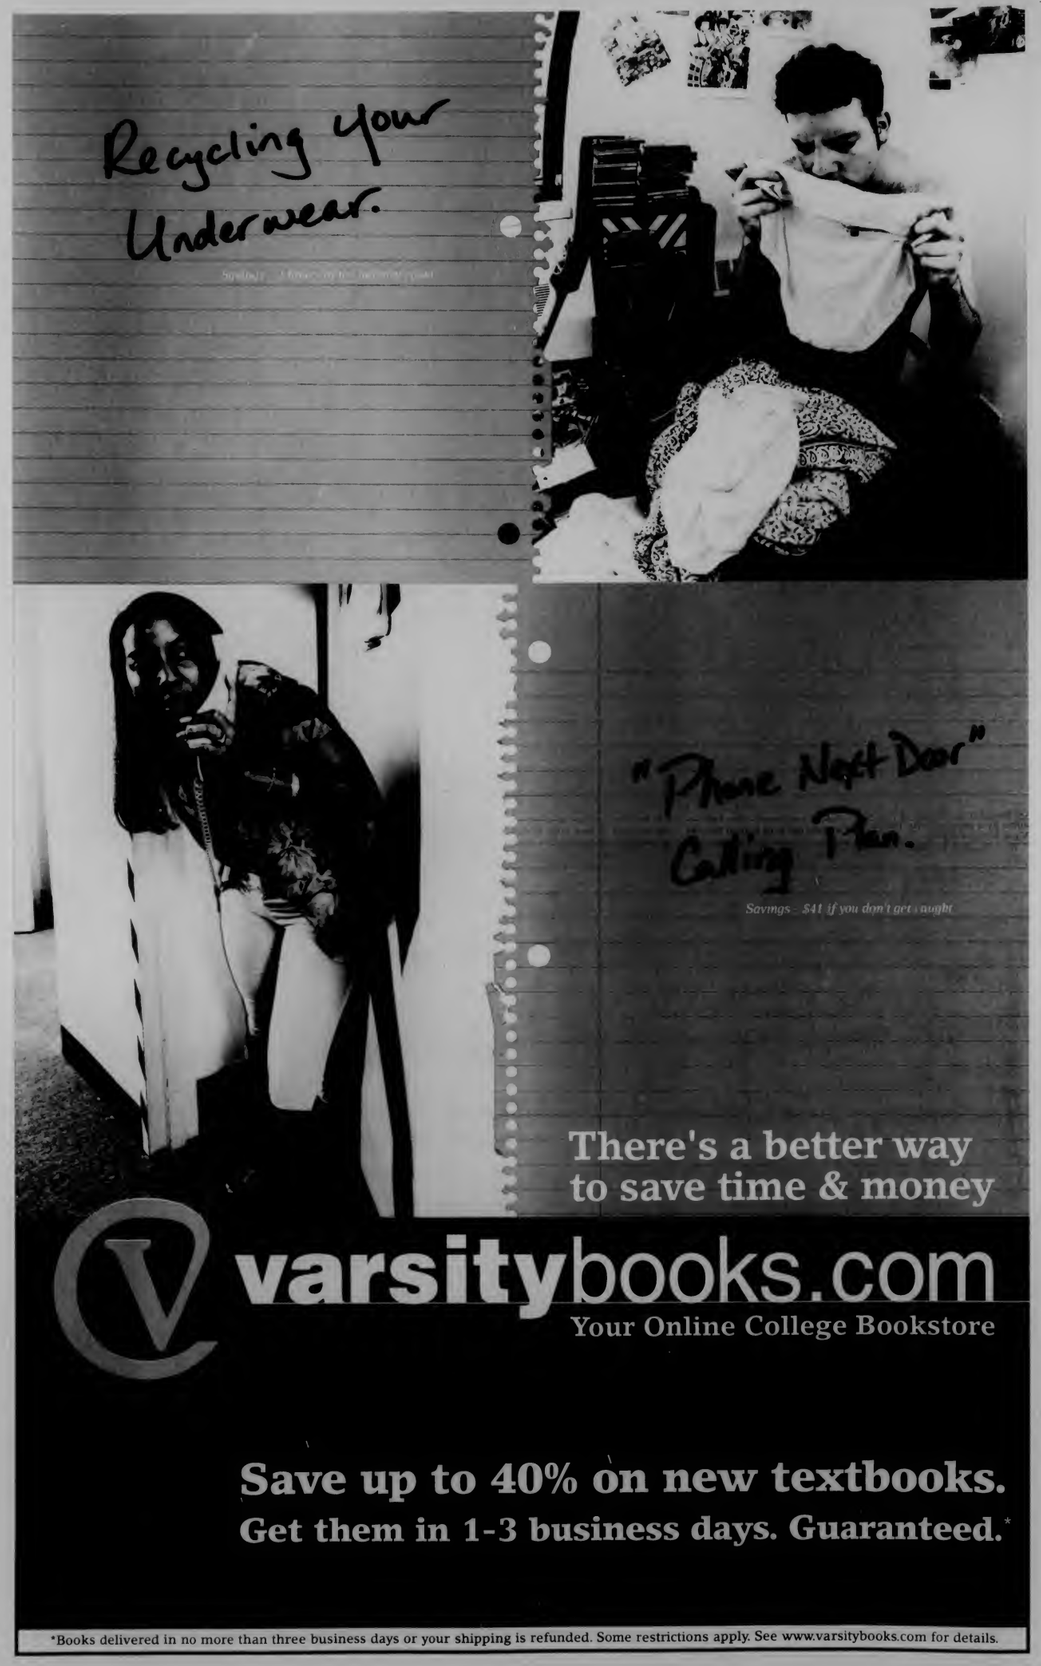
Sometimes it isn't



Jewish college students are eligible for a once-in-a-lifetime free trip to Israel. What's the catch? There isn't one. It's our gift to 5000 Jewish college students who've never been on a group trip to Israel. Here's how it works. Log on to our website and choose which program is right for you. And this winter break you could be doing stuff like going on an archeological dig, exploring Jerusalem, or relaxing in the Dead Sea. And we'll pick up the tab. It's that simple.

East Lansing. Lloyd Carr would have to figure that if he gets through the first wave unscathed, his Wolverines would be in position to challenge for the national championship. To end the year, Michigan plays at Penn State before rounding out the century against, fittingly, Ohio State.

Anthony Thomas has rushed for 223 yards through two games and will look to punish the Syracuse defensive line with his 221-pound frame. The 'Cuse blew out Toledo before disposing of their second week cupcake Central Michigan.

Both teams should be well-rested after a weekend waltz. Turnovers might prove to be the difference. Michigan has forced eight fumbles and three interceptions in just two games. Even better, the Wolverines have yet to relinquish the ball.

Look for Syracuse to pound the ball into the ground, using junior tailback Dee Brown for at least 25 carries. The Orangemen have four starters back from last year's team that paved the way for Donovan McNabb and Kyle McIntosh. Gone is Rob Konrad, who has graduated to the pros, but other than guard Joe Burton, the offensive line is back for a fourth season together.

If Brown's hands prove slippery and freshman quarterback Troy Nunes buckles under the pressure of facing a national power like Michigan, look out.

Hint: look out.

I like Michigan on the road, giving six, proving along with PSU that the ACC better qualifies as the Beast of the East.

Picks of the Week:

Last year's record: 29-32

Well, I suppose I can't avoid the Game of the Week. While high scoring works in baseball, the BCS doesn't buy into Meatball State at home anymore. Rivaling Wisconsin for non-conference club team schedule is pretty much everyone in the SEC.

Florida and Tennessee: two big schools that live and die on Saturday afternoons, square off in Gainesville in what should determine that outcome of the SEC East.

Central Florida and Western Michigan simply aren't good enough warm-ups for a very young Gator defense. In Gainesville, getting two, gimme the Vols winning in double figures.

In other games across the country, I'll take BYU at home against undefeated Colorado State, giving eight. Oh yeah, Akron's actually favored at home by a point against Temple. Yikes. Gimme the Zips.

Piazza a big "hit" with Mets

By Jason Reid
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES - Mike Piazza was surprised to learn that the Los Angeles Dodgers have made overtures to reacquire him from the New York Mets, and many of his former Dodger teammates were surprised as well.

Some were confused, wondering why team officials would pursue the all-star catcher after Fox executive Chase Carey traded Piazza last season because he spurned the team's contract offers and criticized management publicly.

Others said it simply didn't make sense for the Dodgers to target Piazza because the Mets wouldn't trade him during the first year of his seven-year, $91-million deal.

"I was surprised to hear it," said first baseman Eric Karros, among Piazza's longtime friends. "Not so much that the club would be interested in a player of Mike's caliber, because we all know Mike is an MVP-type player. Either Mike or (Atlanta Brave third baseman) Chipper Jones should be the (National League) MVP, in my opinion.

It's just that the Mets have made a long commitment to Mike. It would be a very big surprise to me if Mike didn't spend a big part of that contract with the Mets. I would be shocked if he didn't.

Piazza obviously isn't headed back to the Dodgers at this point, but seven years is a long time.

Malone has a good relationship with Piazza's agent, Dan Lozano, and his partners at the Beverly Hills Sports Council.

If the Mets and Piazza decide to break up in the future, who knows? After all, who thought a TV executive would trade Mike Piazza.

Pound is all bark, no bite

By T.J. Simers
Los Angeles Times

CLEVELAND - They waited three years for this, and by the start of the fourth quarter they were headed to the parking lot, witnesses no more to the worst defeat at home in Cleveland Browns' history.

If the gun-toting, bayonet-fixed U.S. Marine Corps Silent Drill Platoon had performed in pregame festivities with the same precision as the Browns, it would have been a blood-bath.

The Pittsburgh Steelers pounded the expansion Browns, 43-0, Sunday night, as happy as anyone that Cleveland is back in the league after recording their seventh victory in a row over them.

It was only the ninth time in franchise history the Browns had failed to score at home, the very first time in the new Cleveland Browns Stadium before 73,138.

We learned about some of our individuals tonight," Cleveland Coach Chris Palmer said.

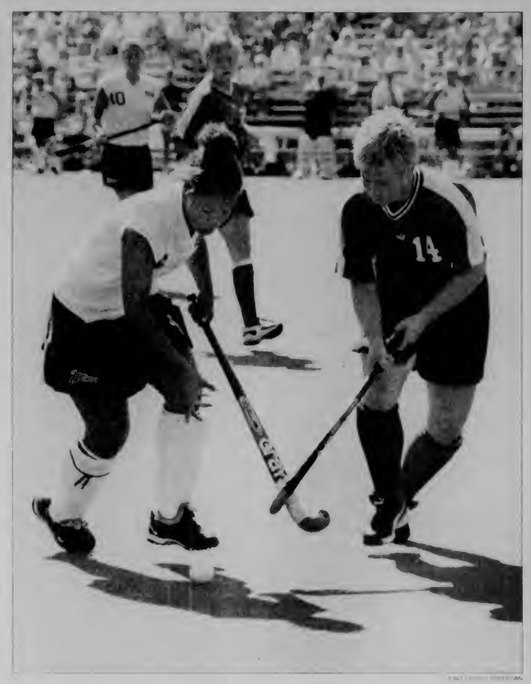
They can't play football very well.

The Steelers had more points than the Browns' had offensive yards, 43-40, and if the city of Cleveland thought the return of football and a blimp flying overhead with a national TV audience watching would be a boost to its self-esteem - oops.

I'm just sorry the fans of Cleveland had to go through that joke tonight," fullback Marc Edwards said.

This was one for the "dawgs," all right, the Browns running nine times for nine yards, a dead man falling flat on his face gaining more yardage on the average.

Ty Detmer and Tim Couch combined to average 1.6 yards a passing play. Couch, the No. 1 player selected in the 1999 draft, came on in relief in the fourth quarter and his first pass as a professional was intercepted. He's still waiting for his first completion.



The easiest way to take the crowd out of it is not to give them anything to cheer about," Pittsburgh Coach Bill Cowher said.

I think all of it's execution.

Whose execution? This was cruel and inhumane punishment for a group of people who once cheered Jim Brown, Otto Graham and Marion Motley. All the anticipation, the hoopla, the fireworks. As badly as these people felt when Art Modell took his team to Baltimore and as good as they felt three hours earlier in the evening, it just might never be the same.

Commissioner Paul Tagliabue showed up before the game, the noted stadium serial killer returning to the scene of the crime, christening the Cleveland Browns' new playpen and officially putting an end to the grimy history of down and dirty football.

Tagliabue had allowed Modell to abandon these people, and it appears he wants to knock off the Los Angeles Coliseum next, maybe as early as Monday after another set of expansion meetings in New York. Hope he be damned, and the day he comes when the NFL will have a stadium built with only luxury boxes.

This weekend the UMass field hockey team will be looking to rebound from a loss to Maryland.

Horoscopes

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your mood is not constant today, but fluctuates according to the wind. You may find it difficult to concentrate.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may have a bit of a conflict today with your various responsibilities. A big project at work could keep you after hours and your main man or woman may not be too pleased at a glitch in the normal schedule. Smooth things out over a good dinner.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You are a force to be reckoned with today, especially in the job arena. With the magnetism of your personality alone, you could make great headway, but you are also in a mood to improvise. Your spur-of-the-moment creations really fill the bill.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may have to let go of something or someone today. Sagittarians of both sexes will be in the mood for romance, with someone new somewhere old, or with that very special person who is always there for you.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Today you could form a strategic alliance with someone who may figure big in your future success. Whatever the situation, show some feelings in the encounter to show that this is not just another meeting.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Your pretty determined not to let this day get away from you. You are pushing yourself. It's not all business. Later in the day many Aquarians will grab their significant others or their new sweeties and gather with the regulars at a local watering hole.

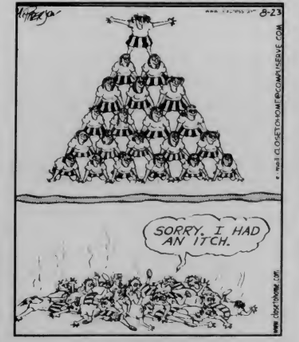
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may be extremely sensitive today to whatever environment you find yourself in. What is definitely true is that your main person is eager to see you and should be in an excellent frame of mind.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You are geared up to plunge into a new project today. You should quickly get all the background information you need, and if it isn't work that occupies you, it may be a hunt for bargains in the house and property market.

TAURUS (April 20-May. 20) – You may feel overworked and undervalued, and a team worker may not come through on a promise of help. It is a pain, but don't overreact. What will save the day is the evening, when you and your partner can connect and tell each other your troubles.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A small matter that you would normally pass off as "things happen" could set your teeth on edge today. A cause may be recent, impractical moves on behalf of your mate. You are likely to be far too busy to start World War III during work hours.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Your ambition is showing. Cancer, and someone higher up may notice. Cancers tend to get ahead by taking on more responsibility, but be sure you are not encroaching on someone else's territory.



LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – It's not easy to put anything over on a Leo, but today someone may try to do just that. It may come in the form of a secret about someone close to you. Because you could be a bit gullible now, don't necessarily believe everything you hear.

Your Guide to all that's going on in the Pioneer Valley

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian — September 14, 1999

Lions hope to roar in Miami

Last year, the Pittsburgh Panthers finished 2-9 with victories over Division 1-AA Villanova by a touchdown and a 35-0 blowout of Akron. Okay, so it's Akron. The team's nickname is the Zips and they play in front of a hostile crowd at the Rubber Bowl. It's Akron.

Despite the Panthers futility in the Walt Harris regime, a hapless 9-16 mark over three years, including a 30-10 victory over Bowling Green. But let's credit Pitt. The perennial doormats of the Big East took on No. 2 Penn State last week and played them to the final gun, coming a LaVar Arrington fingertip away from going blow for blow in overtime. Las Vegas gave the Panthers 35 points from the opening kickoff and they played their hearts out, falling to Joe Pa's Pride 20-17 in University Park.

Penn State was rattled and fell a spot in the Associated Press poll, in spite of embarrassing Arizona 41-7 in the Pigskin Classic. The Nittany Lions looked sloppy, gaining just 65 yards rushing in a run-oriented system that Joe Paterno has used since accepting the job in Happy Valley 33 years ago. The knock on the Lions was that they lacked a quarterback, using a quarterback-by-committee system with seniors Kevin Thompson and Rashard Casey running the show.

Instead, the duo made up for PSU's rough day on the ground by throwing for a combined 320 yards, with Casey hitting Mike Cerimele for the game's opening score midway through the first quarter. The game was tied through three quarters before an Eric McCoo score and a Travis Forney field goal proved to be enough for the victory.

It doesn't get any easier for Paterno, as last year's Outback Bowl champions head down south for a non-conference battle with Miami. The Hurricanes have already made their dent on the bruisers of the Big Ten, knocking off Ohio State in the Meadowlands 23-12.

Linebacker U. will walk into arguably the nation's second-best linebacking core, with the 'Canes fielding Dan Morgan, Nate Webster, and Michael Smith, a trio that leads the Big East's best defense into what may be the Hurricanes' biggest game of the season... which says a lot.

Head coach Butch Davis certainly learned a lot after last year's Bowl Championship Series dilemma. A light schedule proves nothing. Kansas State earned the ridicule by beating Indiana State and Northern Illinois by a combined score of 139-7, their mortality proven by a pair of losses to close the season. With the toughest non-conference schedule and one head on the three-headed monster severed (Ohio State), Miami takes on the Nittany Lions two weeks before its intrastate showdown with Florida State in Tallahassee.

Replacing the departed Scott Covington was senior Kenny Kelly, who benefited from a pair of great receivers in the win over the Buckeyes. Santana Moss and Reggie Wayne took advantage of a very average cornerbacker duo, exploding for 155 receiving yards.

Penn State's secondary is headed by the Big Ten's best cover man, senior David Macklin, who teams with Anthony King at the line of scrimmage. What killed the Buckeyes might prove to be a problem for the Nittany Lions as well. King stands 5'8" while Macklin stands an inch taller. Moss shook three defenders in a 67-yard TD reception that put the game out of reach. Wayne has five inches on King, his likely opponent.

Problem. Kelly won't get the ball off. Realistically, the distance between Miami's defense is a far cry from that of Penn State. Without a 300-pounder on the starting offensive line, the 'Canes will have to rely on quick drops and slant patterns on offense. This critic isn't a believer in Kelly. The Orange Bowl may be the Orange Bowl, but a bad quarterback against a great defense will prove disastrous this Saturday.

Giving three on the road, I'll take Penn State to win big.

Michigan and Syracuse do battle in the Carrier Dome, the Wolverines looking to avenge a 38-28 loss last season in Ann Arbor. The Big Blue barely hung on to beat Notre Dame and probably shouldn't have, but this week will be a different story. The offense ironed out the kinks against Rice, shooing away the Owls with a 37-3 drubbing.

Forget revenge. Michigan needs to gear up for a fierce upcoming schedule that includes a home date with Purdue and visits to Madison and

Former UM Standout Will Go For Gold

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

When it was time to win, University of Massachusetts softball team knew it always had a shot. The Minutewomen had the nation's most dominant pitcher in Danielle Henderson on their side.

For her greatness, Henderson has the honor of representing the United States in the 2000 Olympic Games that will be held in Sydney, Australia. The 15-player roster was announced September 6th and Henderson will be one of five pitchers. She is the only addition to a pitching staff that dominated the 1996 Atlanta games en route to a gold medal.

"I am excited and honored to be representing the United States in the Olympics," Henderson said of her selection to the squad. "I have dreamed of being an Olympian since I started to throw a softball, and I'm thrilled to have the dream finally come true. I was nervous waiting to hear if I made the team, but when I did I was just so happy."

The former UM standout had an outstanding summer playing for the U.S. National Team. She played a key role in the Canada Cup and the Pan American Games, with the U.S. capturing the gold medal in both competitions.

"Harry," as she was known by the UM community, was exceptional in the Pan American games. The hurler from Commack, NY was 3-0 with two perfect games and a one-hit shutout. In these performances, she was phenomenal, striking out 32 batters in just 15 innings of work.

A senior last year, Harry capped a brilliant career for the maroon and white by capturing the Honda Award for softball, which is given to the nation's top collegiate player. A three-time All-American selection while at UM, the intimidating right-hander was also named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year and tournament Most Valuable Player four times.

In her junior and senior seasons in a Minutewoman uniform, the rise-ball specialist led the nation in strikeouts. By the end of her UMass career Henderson found herself second all-time on the NCAA strikeout list with an astonishing 1,343. As if that wasn't enough she threw three perfect games and 14 no-hitters. To go along with these attributes she also hurled 72 shutouts, which places her 12th on the NCAA list.

In her senior campaign "Harry" appeared in 37 games posting an astronomical 30-4 record with 465 strikeouts. She possessed a 0.39 earned run average while holding opponents to a .090 batting average. During the year Henderson set an NCAA record for consecutive scoreless innings with 105. The span was from March 16-May 2. The mark eclipsed ex-UCLA great Debbie Doom's mark of 102 set in 1984. She also had a streak of 26 consecutive wins which went from February 27-May 20. This ranks among the top single-season in NCAA history.

As the owner of 25 school records she takes place her in an elite company of UM softball players. With a 108-35 career mark, she led the Minutewomen to four consecutive A-10 titles and NCAA tournament berths. Of those four trips to the NCAA's two ended with a place in the Women's College World Series being named the Most Outstanding Player of the NCAA Regional in both 1997 and 1998.

By being selected as an Olympian, Harry joins some of UMass' finest athletes, including field hockey greats Megan Donnelly, Pam Bustin and Judy Strong, along with current UMass coach Patty Shea and former field hockey coach Pam Dixon, who coached the Olympic squad in 1996. Ron Villone, currently a pitcher with the Cincinnati Reds, and Briana Scurry, who led the U.S. Women's National Soccer Team to a World Cup victory in July, have also played on Olympics Teams since 1980.

After shattering 25 records while at UMass, Danielle Henderson will be looking to add an Olympic gold medal to her already enormous trophy case.

UM Men's XC places 5th in Boston

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Staff

Like true competitive athletes, the UMass men's cross country team is already preparing for their meet next Saturday after finishing fifth with 115 points in last Friday's Boston College Cross Country Meet. The event was held at Franklin Park in Boston.

Iona secured the top spot accumulating 36 points, followed by Boston College with 41 points, University of New Hampshire with 48 points, and the University of Connecticut with 110 points. Iona's top runner, Graham Reid, finished with a time of 25:13.

UMass' top finisher was Matt Ely. He finished in 17th place with a time of 26:35, followed by Salvatore Nastasi. Nastasi, who had the second fastest time for UMass at 26:46, placed him in the 21st spot, while Kevin Curtin finished 25th for the Minutemen with a time of 27:04.

"I thought everybody performed pretty well," said head coach Ken O'Brien of the effort. "It was probably what I would call a solid effort on our part. I think what it shows us is that we do have a lot of kids of relatively solid ability – kids who are in pretty decent shape and of about even ability at this time. Our next five runners were all within 36 seconds of him, [Ely]. Our timespread, the difference between our first runner and our sixth runner were pretty close," he continued.

Although last Friday's wet weather was hardly ideal for running, O'Brien didn't feel that the rain compromised their performance.

"It was pretty much a rainy day, but really the course was in pretty decent condition for the amount of rain that we had that day," O'Brien reflected.

"But I think that the course was so dry earlier that it sucked most of it, [rain], up. I don't think the weather was a major factor," he said.

Now that the Minutemen have one meet under their belt, O'Brien anticipates they will be getting back in stride.

"Sometimes that first meet makes everyone a little bit timid. So I think that was one aspect of it. But I think we'll try to do some things in practice this week that focus on preparation also, and I have no doubts that we'll try a game plan next week that will try to get us up near the front runners a little more," said O'Brien.

One of UMass' main goals will be to try to build a bridge in the gap between their top times and that of their opponents, which in their last meet was approximately 1:22.

"What we want to do is to narrow that down to somewhere around thirty to forty seconds," said O'Brien. "Hopefully in the next couple of weeks, we can bring that whole group of runners that are thirty seconds from each other and move them up into the higher part of the race. I think if we do that the team has a good chance for success."

For a team that is mostly sophomores this season, the Minutemen are also looking to their senior runners for direction. Last Friday's top finisher, Ely, is using his experience as an example.

"Matt Ely, I thought, assumed the role of front runner and leader very successfully during the day. Hopefully Matt will continue to provide the leadership and then a couple of the upper classmen also will get involved," said O'Brien.

However, in order for the maroon and white to accomplish their goal of closing the gap between their times and that of their main opponents, it will require intensive physical and mental preparation.

"What our task will be now and in the next couple of weeks is to try to motivate and to also physically bring around at least two or three people who will gain some confidence to break away from that pack that they're running in, and try to close down that gap between them and the other teams first runners," said O'Brien. "What we need to do is to shake a couple of people out of the trees and hopefully they can get some confidence and we'll take the step to the next higher plateau a little bit.

UM will next be in action on Saturday, September 18 when they travel to Vermont for a quad meet with Boston University, the University of Maine and the University of Vermont.

New owner views Redskins collapse

By Tony Kornheiser
The Washington Post

You're Danny Snyder. You've been a fan your entire life, and now you're the new owner of the Washington Redskins. You're sitting in the owner's box surrounded by friends and family, watching your team demolish the hated Dallas Cowboys on Opening Day. By early in the fourth quarter the Redskins have scored 32 straight points _ and if not for a couple of fumbles inside the Dallas 5-yard line, it could have been 43 straight points! The score is 35-14. The Cowboys are road kill. You're Danny Snyder and you're having the time of your life. You're on your feet high-fiving everyone in sight.

You're Danny Snyder, and it's late in the fourth quarter. You're not high-fiving anyone anymore. Now it is Dallas scoring all the points. Your offense is like a chorus line; it goes one-two-three kick on three straight possessions. Your defense is gassing. As a fan you have seen this before. Boomer Esiason did it to the Redskins in 1996; he put up three touchdowns in the fourth quarter. Now Troy Aikman is doing it. On the field, Brian Mitchell is watching and saying to himself, "It's like a nightmare. You see it dwindling away, and you don't know why."

You're Danny Snyder, and your heart is pounding. There's 3:01 left to go in the game, and Troy Aikman has to go 90 yards without any timeouts. The Redskins need to make a stand here, but the defense has wilted. Aikman is working the sideline passing routes like Johnny Unitas, moving steadily up the field while conserving precious time. You're Danny Snyder, and you see your defensive linemen jump offside four times in the drive, one-two-three kick on three straight defense is attacking itself.

Aikman finds Michael Irvin in the end zone, and the game is tied with 1:50 to go. On the field, Darryl Pounds is saying to himself, "They should have been put away long before this."

You're Danny Snyder, and you're preparing for overtime when Pounds delights you by picking off an Aikman pass. You get another gift when Kevin Mathis is flagged for interfering with Michael Westbrook on a pass Westbrook couldn't have reached with a ball-retriever. There are three seconds left in the game when the Redskins line up for the game-winning field goal from 41 yards out.

Women's XC places second

By Bryan Smith and Andrea Crane
Collegian Staff

On Friday the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team traveled to Boston for a quad meet with the University of Connecticut, the University of New Hampshire, and host Boston College. The meet was held at Franklin Park in Boston.

In a meet against tough regional competition the Minutewomen placed second with 49 points behind the host Eagles with 18. The Wildcats finished in third with 68 points followed by the Huskies with 110.

UM had three athletes finish in the top ten. The Minutewomen were led by senior captains Sally Hirsch, who placed seventh, and Nicole Way who finished eighth with times of 19:01 and 19:05 respectively. At their heels was sophomore Kristin Cisowski in ninth, only a second behind Way.

Finding themselves just out of the top ten were Sharon Tillotson and Lizzie Sheptyck who placed 12th and 13th.

The maroon and white are picked to finish atop the Atlantic 10 in the preseason coaches' poll. The Minutewomen, with 10 of 11 starters returning just might find themselves hoisting another A-10 banner, which would be their fifth consecutive title.

Head coach Julie LaFreniere entered her 13th season at the helm of the cross-country squad with the aforementioned meet. The coach has led UM to an unprecedented six of the last eight A-10 titles. To go along with her team's success she has captured Coach of the Year honors five times (1991, '92, '95-'97).

A class of 1977 graduate, LaFreniere led the Minutewomen to a New England Championships and ninth place national finish in the first women's National Championship.

LaFreniere's UMass squad will next be in action on Saturday, September 18 when they travel to Burlington, VT for a quad meet with the Blue Devils of Central Connecticut, the Boston University Terriers , and the host Vermont Catamounts.

Housing shortage; Solution unclear

By Andrea M. Peers
Collegian Correspondent

The number of students without permanent housing has been cut back from about 400 to approximately 250, but almost all of the permanent living spaces are occupied, according to Michael Gilbert, Director of Housing Services.

Gilbert explained the current housing situation last night at a meeting with the leadership of the Student Government Association. The future of the ongoing housing crisis was the topic of the meeting, which focused on the overwhelming number of students who have not been placed in permanent living spaces.

Gilbert said all students in temporary housing were accommodated well, with room furnishings like any other room on campus. Almost all temporary setups have phones, locks on doors and an unusual amount of large space, as lounges are a bit bigger than the average sized room. Despite this positive side to the story, a few residents are still without phones, in which case they have been given a phone card and a temporary voice mail system to receive messages.

But there are no more rooms for male students available anywhere on campus, and just a handful of rooms for female students are left.

In response to the large number of students without permanent housing, the SGA, led by president Jeff Howe, has proposed a plan which would allow a limited number of sophomores to move off campus in order to accommodate students and their needs. This number is estimated to be anywhere from 50 to 100 sophomores. If such an agreement is made, the SGA said it would provide a solution to the housing crunch.

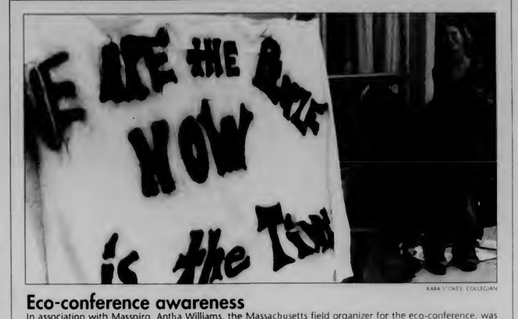
"In an emergency situation like this, housing needs to look after the well being of the student body," Howe said. "These living conditions are absolutely unacceptable."

Michael Billard, speaker of the student senate, also represented the SGA in the meeting.

"With all these extra students, housing is making a profit on this number crunch," Billard said. "They don't try to accommodate students, but they should."

Howe and Billard said they are going to continue the push for an off-campus deal to end the housing crisis.

The proposal for off-campus living also involves the University's Board of Trustees, headed by President William M. Bulger. Trustees make all final decisions and rules about campus life. Currently, within the guidelines of the Board, it is absolutely mandatory that freshman and sophomores live on campus.



However, in the event of an emergency situation, the Board can vote on whether a temporary alternative could be passed, such as the one proposed by the SGA. "This certainly sounds like an area that needs to be explored in detail. It is our concern as well as President Bulger's concern that the overcrowding at the University needs to be looked into," said Robert Connolly, the Associate Vice-President for Communications on the Board of Trustees.

Alternatives have been suggested to open up more space. Resident assistants could live with another student or RA, if they choose.

Gilbert is expecting some students to transfer or move off-campus, alleviating some of the crunch. As far as off-campus housing for sophomores is concerned, Gilbert said the issue is a "next year idea." He said this plan will not go into effect this year.

Howe and the SGA said they will continue to fight Housing Services until common ground is met.

"The University is trying to improve the quality of education, but at the same time they are jumping too far ahead and not taking care of the students that are already on campus. That needs to be changed," Howe said.

State budget puts UM on hold

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Correspondent

Leaders of the Student Government Association at the University of Massachusetts forecast issues for the upcoming year to include students' rights, privatization and their own elections. Members of the University's administration, while also responsible for student affairs, are faced with a different series of upcoming situations.

A big issue according to both former Secretary of the Faculty Senate John Bracey and Vice-Chancellor of Administration and Finance Paul Page is the University's lack of a budget for the upcoming year.

"With the lack of a budget, it can be hard for a department to start planning without those firm numbers," Bracey said.

Page agreed, adding, "I wish we had a budget for this year. That would make our lives a little less uncertain."

Page said he has no idea when the budget negotiations between the Speakers of the Massachusetts House and Senate will be completed.

"Until that money is in the bank," Page said, "anyone's guess is as good as mine."

But Page, despite the budget impasse, is upbeat about the upcoming year.

"This is what we're all about," Page said.

He sees other issues on the horizon, including the continued effort of UMass to meet its goal as a land grant institution, and continued work on the Capital Program.

"We are optimistic about our Capital Program in terms of building repair and new facilities, which would include bringing the new computer science building on-line," Page said.

The Capital Program was developed in 1995 and 1996, and was a five-year plan. According to Page, the end of the first phase of the Capital Program is coming. He admits that some of the projects described in that plan haven't been brought to closure.

"Our needs at that time were so great that we scoped out what we saw as emergency needs," Page said. "We left some projects for the second phase, like the addition of an engineering building onto the new computer science building."

Page also said other general construction projects around campus will be occurring including the

UM bans drug paraphernalia

By Jake Lilien

Last year, the University of Massachusetts implemented a more stringent alcohol policy in which students would be expelled from their dormitories after a third violation of alcohol regulations. This year, the UMass administration has focused on lowering students' drug usage by prohibiting all forms of drug paraphernalia from campus residence halls.

In an August 16 letter to all students, the University announced that "objects used or primarily intended for use or designed for use in ingesting, inhaling, or otherwise introducing marijuana, cocaine, hashish, or hashish oil into the human body" were classified as controlled substances and would not be permitted on campus. According to the letter, this category included, but was not limited to, "pipes, water pipes, bongs, roach clips, and vials." The University also stressed that the unauthorized possession of hypodermic syringes and needles was also prohibited.

Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin, the Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Dean of Students, stated that the policy change was not prompted by any specific incidents on campus.

"We've had a general concern that there was a general increase in drug use," she said. "We were getting an increase in the number of reports from [employees of] Residence Life about concerns for drug use.

"Looking at the code as we expressed it, the formal language was too restrictive," she said. "I don't think it allowed us to address the concerns that we had.

"Since the implementation of the alcohol sanctioning program with its emphasis on education and community responsibility, there was a dramatic increase in alcohol related violations," Vanin said. The new paraphernalia regulations were created "to assist us in a stricter and more consistent enforcement of illegal drug violations."

Currently, there are specific sanctions for drug paraphernalia as there are under the alcohol policy in which students are forced to undergo housing probation, alcohol education housing removal and/or suspension from the University for alcohol violations. The University will determine sanctions for possession or distribution of paraphernalia based on the severity of the offense.

Vanin hopes that the new policy toward drug paraphernalia will help lower the amount of drug usage at the University.

"I hope that people will take seriously our concerns about drugs," she said. "All forms of drugs are illegal, and I think they have a negative impact on residential and learning communities."

Seth Avakian, the UMass Student Trustee, disagrees with the change.

"Drug paraphernalia is not illegal in Massachusetts, and it does not pose a health or safety risk to the people in the dorms," he said. "Thus, I don't feel it should be prohibited.

"Students have a right to privacy in their rooms," he added, "and Housing should not be searching through their rooms. As long as [drug paraphernalia] is not in plain view, it shouldn't be a problem."

Delta Chi reopens after a reinspection this week.

Delta Chi permitted to open

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The efforts of Delta Chi fraternity members were rewarded Monday, when their fraternity house re-opened after receiving a certificate of occupancy from the town of Amherst.

The fraternity members had been working, with the help of a contractor, to restore safe living conditions to the house.

The building was closed in August, when it failed building, fire and health inspections. However, according to Amherst Building Inspector Richard Gormely, the Delta Chi members "cleaned it up very well," and at 3 p.m. Monday the fraternity was given clearance to live in the house.

"They'd been working into the night to make it spotless, and it was in very, very good condition," Gormley said.

Delta Chi members moved into the house Monday night, and on Tuesday began their "rush" period, during which new members pledge the fraternity.

"Fixing [the house] brought our fraternity a lot closer together," said Adam DeCruz, a member of Delta Chi and the President of the Inter-Fraternity Council. "It gave us something to rally around and a goal to accomplish. We proved we could accomplish our goals. It was a learning experience."

The fraternity was initially given a warning on May 27 for a number of violations, including inoperable lights and exit signs, missing hand railings and a damaged fire alarm system.

Upon re-inspecting the house in August, Gormley found the condition of the house to be worse than the previous inspection, and refused to grant a certificate of occupancy.

Gormley was pleased with the results of the fraternity's efforts to restore the house since its closure, though, and Monday granted a certificate of occupancy.

"The exit signs were repaired, holes in the ceilings and walls were filled and given final touches, and a [damaged] door had been worked on," he said. "The Board of Health was very happy with it."

Gormley stressed, however, that the town still insists on some minor repairs.

"They still have to make sure that

Library journal collection to shrink

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Correspondent

The periodical collection of the W.E.B. DuBois Library may be downsized by over 700 journals as soon as the end of this month, if the state does not increase the library's budget.

According to library communications specialist Emily Silverman, the rapid price increases in periodicals outpace the funds available to the library. Because of this financial situation, the library may have to make cuts of up to 12 percent or a $400,000 dollar amount to stabilize its budget. For students this means that up to 742 periodicals could be cut from the library budget. These cuts span through every area and are by all accounts unavoidable. Periodicals covering topics ranging from geological sciences, law, business and the humanities are all listed in the proposed cut.

Although Silverman said the library is "still holding out hope that the budget cuts will not come to pass," a committee of faculty liaisons and library personnel have already generated a list of periodicals to be cut. The group began meeting last spring to recommend titles to be eliminated from the budget. Jerry Epstein, Chair of the Economics department and faculty liaison, said he tried to cut periodicals that "were not used as much by the faculty and students."

Some other criterion for the elimination of the journals were factors such as whether or not the title was duplicated elsewhere in the library, available for the students somewhere in the area, or available through the Boston Library Consortium. The library is also relying upon the electronic document delivery service. This service provides students with the ability to receive their journals electronically by means of a computer. The library remains hopeful that this will help to fill the gap that the budget cuts will leave.

For the time, the library has both faculty and students speaking on its behalf in Boston. But, Silverman said, the settling of the budget is a long and tedious process that has yet to be resolved to the satisfaction of all parties involved. Currently, the library has been taking suggestions and comments by e-mail from both professors and students in regards to the situation. Over 40 responses have been received and more continue to filter in daily.

Silverman said the library staff hopes that the budget problems can be resolved quickly and that some of the journals originally targeted for removal can be renewed. But, she said if the budget remains the same, more journals might have to be removed in the future.

Amherst gets new bookstore and restaurant

Two new businesses, The Raven Book Store and The Monkey Bar, both on North Pleasant Street, hope to attract students with fresh appearances and a greater variety of services.

John Petrovato, owner of The Raven Book Store, said his store will offer an original selection of books to the community not found in other bookstores. The Raven's collection of over 15,000 books includes volumes on history, art, philosophy, and other topics.

"I have a lot of what then [students] are looking for," he said. "It's more focused; the mostly academic collection

Two million evacuated as Floyd threatens Florida

By Lauren Terrazzano
Newsday

BOYNTON BEACH, Fla. — Nearly 500 people packed the windowless band alcove and locker rooms at Christa McAuliffe Middle School here yesterday, grabbing any shred of floor they could find to seek shelter from the impending force of Hurricane Floyd.

"I'm not afraid not to stay here," said Judi Cagle, 61, of nearby Lake Worth, who struggled to maneuver her daughter's wheelchair through the narrow, crowded hallways of the school-turned-emergency-shelter. "If something happened and we had to move quickly, I couldn't bring her out of my house by myself," Cagle said, whose daughter Trudi, 40, has cerebral palsy.

Elderly evacuees sat in wheelchairs and at desks, while children entertained themselves with books provided by the American Red Cross. People brought lawn chairs, pillows and sleeping bags into the stuffy cinderblock rooms. As Floyd took an ominous path along Florida's coast, an estimated 2 million people evacuated barrier islands, mobile home parks and flood-prone areas as police set drawbridges into lockdown positions yesterday. Highways clogged, schools closed and most shelters were full by late yesterday afternoon.

After the storm took a northward turn, the hurricane warning was lifted in the Miami area, and evacuees there were allowed to return home, but other parts of the state and areas farther north remained in danger.

The monstrous, 600-mile-storm — wider than the state of Florida — threatened to strike land early tomorrow, probably in Georgia or South Carolina.

By 5 p.m. yesterday, Floyd was centered 255 miles southeast of Cape Canaveral, moving northwest at 12 mph. Its winds had eased from Monday's 155 mph to 140 yesterday, but it was still a Category 4 storm, the second-most powerful hurricane designation.

In Georgia, authorities ordered 500,000 people to evacuate six coastal counties. A similar ordered covered about 800,000 people in South Carolina, a week shy of the 10th anniversary of Hurricane Hugo's destructive run.

"This is large, this is ferocious and this is scary," Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said in a morning briefing. "We're doing everything we can to make sure we're prepared."

State emergency management officials they had made a formal request to the federal Emergency Management Agency, which was widely criticized in its response to Hurricane Andrew in 1992, for federal assistance. Yesterday afternoon, President Clinton issued pre-emptive disaster declarations for Florida and Georgia, allowing FEMA to begin supporting state and local authorities. He also planned to return a day early from his trip to New Zealand.

In this region that has survived hurricanes, wildfires and other natural disasters, some asked how much more they could be expected to take.

"We've all been through a lot," said Jose Rosa, 46, of West Palm Beach. He spent much of yesterday boarding up his peach stucco house and taking in lawn furniture while his wife cooked a huge emergency feast of chicken and rice to get them through the next few days. The couple said they wouldn't go to a shelter because they didn't want to leave their house unprotected. "Andrew was bad, but this is worse," said Rosa, who feared he was more directly in the storm's path this time. "I pray to God it goes away."

Those not cramming for scarce shelter space made last-minute forays to crowded supermarkets and home stores, seeking water, bread and plywood to board up their homes.

Elizabeth Negron, 33, and her daughter, Elysia, of nearby Deerfield Beach, who rushed to a supermarket outside Boca Raton yesterday morning to buy a green Coleman cooler, Campbell's soup, cookies and five gallons of bottled water. "I was six months pregnant with my daughter when Andrew hit, and I thought I was going to go into early labor," said Negron, eyeing her daughter, now 7, as she loaded supplies onto a checkout conveyor belt. "I'm not taking any chances."

Lines at supermarkets and Home Depots were long and frustrating for mums who sought groceries and giant planks of plywood to board up windows. While small bottles of specialty waters lay idle on supermarket shelves, customers were grabbing what they could of gallon-jugs, mindful of the five-gallon limit per family. Some gas stations throughout the county had run out of gasoline. At others, motorists waited in long lines.

At the evacuated Kennedy Space Center in Cape Canaveral, Fla., about 80 workers volunteered to stay behind to ride out the storm, which the National Aeronautics and Space Administration feared could destroy the launch pads and shuttle hangars. All four shuttles, worth $2 billion apiece, are parked indoors.

is all hand-picked."

Petrovato, who also owns another bookstore in Northampton that sells over 2,000 books a week, said he was pleased with his expansion into Amherst.

"I have been looking for space in the area for years and this became available," Petrovato said.

The Raven is open everyday from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. and Petrovato said "there are always new books on the shelf."

So far, customers seem happy with the addition of the bookstore to Amherst. As he finished purchasing books, one customer promised he would be back soon.

The Monkey Bar also hopes to provide greater variety to the Amherst community with a novel restaurant and bar. Mauro Aniello, the owner of the popular Pinocchio's, re-modeled and developed the restaurant in an effort to bring something new to Amherst. He has been in the area for the past 16 years and felt it was time for a more unique place, Aniello said.

The restaurant serves lunch and dinner from 11:30 a.m. to 9 p.m., seven days a week, offering entrees such as Cajun Prime Rib and Chicken and Shrimp Jambalaya. Aniello said he is excited about the selection of Monkey Bar originals such as Grilled Alligator Sausage.

After 9 p.m., the family restaurant turns into a New York-style bar scene where the over-21 crowd can enjoy both drinks and entertainment. Some specialty cocktails include Crazy Bananas and Funky Monkeys.

"So far we are very pleased that the restaurant has been a success," Aniello said. "What's so interesting and wonderful is that everyone can come and have a good time; professionals and college students."

Each evening the Monkey Bar has a different theme, including DJ dance nights and Monday Night Football. In addition to a large indoor dance floor, there is an outdoor space.

"The restaurant is meant to be new and different," Aniello said. "To lift the town and have something that is special. It will be a place where the community can benefit from it."

all of the work is completed," he said. "There's a door that has to be fixed, and a joint compound that has to be done better and sealed."

Gormley commended the Delta Chi members for their quick repair following the closing.

"They cooperated very much at the end," he said. He added the only reason the repairs were not made following the warning was that "there was a mix-up over who would be covering the problems for inspection. Everybody thought somebody else was going to do it."

DeCruz said that, in the future, Delta Chi will be sure to avoid the possibility of closure.

"As a problem might occur, we'll fix it right away," he said. "We won't put anything off, so it will always be up to code."

He also asserted that the fraternity does not expect to have any future inspection problems.

Delta Chi was one of two fraternity houses closed during the summer. Pi Kappa Alpha house was also closed for violations Gormley considered more serious than those of Delta Chi. The Pi Kappa Alpha house is not expected to be open this semester.

6:00 News?

OK, sorry, folks, I'm afraid I'm going to be asking you to fry your brain a bit and try to remember the last time you saw a news report on television that handled a topic in a truly exhaustive manner. Well? When was the last time you sat down and saw a piece on the six o'clock news that was more than a headline followed by a couple of hundred words worth of generalities, vague perceptions of truth, and a few shallow facts meant to satisfy our need for information, while actually sketching only the most minimal picture of what happened?

For example, we see news reports about how a wide variety of laws fail in Congress. We hear statistics about voting, we hear a couple of 30-second clips from local representatives, or perhaps words of encouragement from the one of the people who had actually attempted to get the law passed. But do we hear of the true process? Do we hear of the deals that go on? The smoke filled rooms where politicians make and break laws still exist, and on some level the American people realize this, but like a great majority of things that should be reported, the media does not seem to deem them newsworthy.

The question is, "Why?" Why don't we hear that the new government emission standards failed because of the soft money flowing into various political players' pockets from the various automakers, oil companies, and anyone else who has an interest in the maintenance of the status quo? Of course that's just a simple example, and one that isn't necessarily true or current, but the concept holds true. There are plenty of worse, real life examples, yet we don't hear of them. And once again the question is, "Why?"

Chris Collins

Is it the television reporters? The media in general? The government? The corporations who provide advertising dollars?

OK, most reporters would like to do in-depth work and actually inform the country of what is going on. There are bad apples in the world of news reporting just as there are in any group of people, so there are some people who would rather be lazy than seek out a detailed story; but on the whole the problem does not lie in the actual world of reporting. Instead, the entire structure of the televised media is responsible for the problem.

Think about it. A newscast is a pretty simple thing, right? Headlines, a couple of news stories, weather, sports, and a local interest story. Actually, it only looks that way to the viewer. To an insider, the six o'clock news is closer to something like the following: an eye-catching graphic and elaborate music meant to draw viewers in, a headline with a teaser, four 30-second commercials, story from the teaser, weather, sports teaser, four more commercials, the sports, maybe an around the world wrap-up, teaser for a local interest story, four more commercials, cute local interest story and then lotto numbers. Also, don't forget to promote the station's website and various other miscellany that comes with the news business.

So, if you are running a news station, what is the biggest consideration? Well, naturally, you need to produce a news show, avoid offending people so they will watch your show and ensure that you have the money to produce the next day's show by attracting advertising. These considerations (coupled with the fact that production and reporting don't require constant supervision) lead the station managers to direct their attention towards advertisers, the people who can provide the necessary monies to keep a station afloat.

Advertisers, because of their influence (read as "money") are able to exercise a degree of control over the newscast. Consider a hypothetical report on a gun control law's failure and how a government official who had taken money from the gun lobby voted against the law. The gun lobby, the official, anyone who contributed to the lobby, the NRA, and other people might be upset at this report because it looks like they are bending or breaking the rules. Advertisers don't enjoy having their products attached to anything people dislike, so they might pull their support of that particular program because they don't want to lose customers. With no advertising, there is no money to produce pieces like this hypothetical one, leaving the station in a terrible position. If they do a real story, they lose money. If they opt for what has become "standard" coverage – the government failed to pass gun control, here's the bill's sponsor, here's the numbers of people for and against the thing – they maintain their financial well-being by providing information that is not necessarily complete or in the viewer's best interest.

So what are we to do? The media is stuck, and so are we. We wander around our world misinformed because the world's corporations have figured out how to manipulate the system to ensure that they never end up in trouble. Money is king in the country with a Constitution that provides for a president, but not a king. Money is thrown to or withheld from media outlets and the government to keep both institutions willing to bend over backward to appease their corporate sponsors.

So what do we do? Stop watching, and become uninformed instead of misinformed? That's probably not the best of ideas. The first step is to become aware that most representations are not complete and that magazines, television, and every other form of media are in business for the same reason as all other businesses – to put roofs over their heads and food in their bellies.

The second step is to search for alternatives, and I have a few that I can suggest. "This American Life" is a different type of radio show that is in-depth, although it is not a straight news show. However, it is exactly the type of show that the commercial world should take some lessons from. (They have a web site: www.thislife.org Visit it.)

My other alternative is the "Charlie Rose Show." Charlie Rose is one of the world's premier interviewers who presents an hour's worth of interviews that offer a range of topics and subjects (celebrities, politicians and a cavalcade of other interesting and informed people). It is perhaps the best way to spend an hour of time in front of the idiot box.

The third step is to actually demand more. Call the news station if you think they are holding out. Write letters and try to make connections. Why should the American people allow the media to be controlled by corporations when the airwaves are meant to be a public resource? Change only happens when someone demands it, so please stand up and shout for real media coverage.

Britney's big bust

On September 1, 1999 I awoke at 4 a.m. to do the dumbest thing I have ever done. The sun wasn't even up. The neighbor's annoying kids, who live across the street and wake up before the crack of dawn, were still sound asleep. Like a Marine stalking enemies through distant jungles, I had a mission that I was bent on accomplishing. My mission: meet the all-star singing sensation Britney Spears and get her autograph.

My mom had told me about her Boston appearance a week before. I laughed at the thought of a thousand screaming teenie-boppers at Downtown Crossing, but then my mentality changed. Last year my friends and I would watch her on that CTN channel (It is no MTV, but everybody watches it, Campus Cable is the best!), and I would mention her occasionally in my columns. So, I thought, "Why not go get her autograph?" I had never met a full-fledged celebrity. One time my mom said she thought she saw Richard Simmons in the airport, but she found out it was just another disturbingly jovial guy in pink bike-shorts giving away Deal-a-Meals to portly women... or something like that.

As I pulled into the commuter rail station at 4:47 a.m., there were only four other cars there. I carefully concealed the Britney poster that I had purchased the day before... God forbid any other commuter know that I was a 20-year-old Britney Spears fan.

Once I made it to Boston I was pretty pumped up, probably because the sun had finally come up. I was ready to push people out of the way to get one of the 250 wristbands that guaranteed meeting Miss Spears. Women, children, people from the Jimmy Fund, it didn't matter; nothing was standing in my way now. This was Normandy to me, baby. The hell with Jerry's Kids, or the French! I'd fight 'em all off. Anyhow, I got in line at 6:20 a.m. I was the oldest non-parent there, and I was damn proud.

As I stood in line I realized that I had not taken into consideration the fact that the prestigious law office that I ran errands for all summer in a shirt and tie was less than two blocks away. What if one of my co-workers saw me there, amidst the throng of 12-year-olds and their parents? My paranoia grew worse as time passed and more commuters started passing the Britney crowd. I turned my head and stared at the pavement, but it was too late to turn back now. I sang, "Hit Me Baby One More Time" to myself to pass the time.

By 7:50 a.m. the crowd was roaring, and I was finally working my mojo towards the front of the line. Then, when I was a mere five people from the front, the man next to the bracelet lady with too much make-up whipped out a large pink pack of papers. All I could make out on the fliers was the word "Sorry" written across the top.

My spirits fell faster than Jennifer Lopez's single from the top of the charts, even though it's still popular in France. But luck was with me. I looked into the bag and there were three wristbands left. I was No. 148. I was going to meet the teen queen of pop... in five hours.

With all that time to kill my friend "Monique" came into the city to hang out with me and laugh at my pathetic pursuit of a flash-in-the-pan teen singing sensation. We spent the day admiring University of Massachusetts President Billy Bulger's bulging penthouse office suite atop one of the nicest office buildings in Boston. Trust me, it is almost as nice as his box for the UMass football games (which happens to be the same size of the cell that is awaiting his brother if they ever catch him). It allegedly has a $1 million-plus per year price tag and one of the nicest views in the whole city. He deserves it though: he works hard and he's never killed anyone, either. Why should we spend all that money on worthless things like education or enough housing and professors for the entire student body?

I think we should give our precious Chancellor, David K. Scott, a penthouse suite as well. He's never here, anyway. He didn't even bother to show up for freshman Convocation this year. I am sure he was doing something important (his office said he was "out of the country"). This school needs a pre-chancellor major. Course: Chancellor 101. Description: Tour Europe and learn to be refined in a suit and white sneakers. Students are expected to look like they are working and stressed when in fact they are sipping Scotch. There is no mid-term, no final and no thesis papers. Attendance is not expected. Enrollment limited to first 50 interested students. Contact the department to add the course.

Anyway, after a while I decided to show "Monique" where I had slaved away all summer. As soon as I walked in the door I regretted coming back. All the 40-something secretaries were no longer restrained by the fact that I was a co-worker so they started lying to my friend about how lucky she was because I was all that. I swear to God that they were pretending to undress me with their eyes, even though they usually look at me like I'm completely undesirable. I felt like a piece of meat, not even a good piece of meat. It was more like DC meat (grade F.. but edible). I corrected them and told everyone she was only my friend and we weren't connected romantically.

Pretty soon it got out that I was there to get Britney's autograph, and of course the cutest girl in the office was there to see it all. She's only a few years older than I am and she puts Britney to shame in her own right, but as soon as the Britney secret escaped I immediately felt 11 again, playing with my She-Ra action figures (C'mon, I have sisters, cut me some slack). She went on a tirade about how Britney had a fake chest and how she was really 27 and that her songs were so bad she couldn't even lip-sync to them. And I indignantly replied, "So, what's the problem?" as I hid my shamed face.

Fortunately, it was finally time to return to Downtown Crossing to rejoin the line for autographs. The crowd was about 10 times as large and 50 times as loud. Worse yet, they all looked like they were in grade school. They were singing along to Britney's album. They knew all the words. They had signs and t-shirts. They were all looking at me like I was out of place because I was wearing a gray UMass t-shirt.

Fifteen minutes later the clock struck noon. One hour 'till Britney. I tried to convince the people around me that I was there as a joke for a story for my newspaper, but the mom behind me looked skeptical. I think she thought I was an abnormally tall 7th grader. I asked her to take my picture when I got up to see Miss Spears. Then I waited and waited and waited with the corporate types who were walking to lunch. By 1:20 p.m. I had a sinking feeling that she wasn't coming... or it may have been from dehydration... whatever. The people behind the scenes were yelling on cell phones and I knew that that couldn't be good, but still I waited; I had come too far to turn back now.

The crowd was turning ugly, chanting, "Britney, Britney." Some hooligans held up signs saying "Silicone Spears." It is amazing how someone can go from being loved to being hated so fast.

I have done some pretty embarrassing things, but this has to take the cake. At 2:10 p.m. management announced that Britney wasn't coming. She wasn't even in the Commonwealth. I haven't been that disappointed since the last UMass basketball season when the team didn't make the Tournament and a certain coach's contract was still extended. I wasn't the only one shedding tears. There were some little girls next to me who looked like their dog just died. To them Britney is a role model, a life they want to have, a golden dream in a piss-yellow world.

After I wiped the tears from my eyes I made a promise. No more Britney in my stories, and no more Britney on my stereo. I'd had enough of these immature teen celebrities who think they are immortal just because they have one bad album and fake body parts (supposedly). Last year no one had ever heard of her and next year no one will ever remember her. And where are her parents? When I was 17 I couldn't even stay out past 12a.m. and they took all my She-Ra dolls away (damn it). She is running around getting cosmetic surgery.

This depressed me and I began to eat, and eat, and eat. So now I have refined my musical tastes. I hear Cristina Aquilera is pretty talented and she is 18. I listen to "Genie in a Bottle" as I sort my Deal-a-Meal in the morning. Thank you Richard, thank you for letting me get my life back on track.

A sordid tale

I hate throwing up.

I mention this because I think we all hate throwing up. It's one of those shared qualities that bind us all together: men and women, blacks and whites, the lactose intolerant and those who enjoy dairy products.

Ideally, I should be using this space to say something important about society's ills, or to give freshman advice on how to best comport themselves here at UMass. But I have nothing important to say, and I'm certainly the last person anyone should be taking academic advice from. So I'm writing about throwing up.

One night in New Brunswick I got very drunk. The kind of drunk where you find yourself making all sorts of inappropriate proposals to the cocktail waitress, who for some reason takes offense and points you out to the very large bouncer with the "GUNS DON'T KILL PEOPLE, I KILL PEOPLE" t-shirt. It was the kind of drunk where you suddenly find yourself standing in front of the dartboard, a burly ex-Hell's Angel aiming his dart at your left eye, and you have no idea how you got there.

When you reach this level of drunkenness, it's time to leave the bar. Only bad things can happen to you there.

I was staying with my friend Gunner, whose apartment had not been far away at the beginning of the evening but which I now remembered as being somewhere near the New York/New Jersey state line. I was in no condition to be walking around New Brunswick, the geography of which is about as familiar to me as the molecular composition of Play-Doh. And I know very little about Play-Doh.

I had gone to the bar with friends – we were all in town to celebrate Gunner's 21st birthday – but they had all disappeared at some point during the evening. Nothing to be done about it, I thought. Fortunately, out on the street I ran into Gunner's roommate Opus, who was also very drunk but assured me he knew how to get home.

(Gunner and Opus are not their real names. I made them up because their real names are so stupid that no one would believe them.)

On the way back we found a mattress sitting by the curb. Having nowhere to sleep back at the flat, I figured the logical thing to do was drag it home with me. Opus refused to help. I think he was afraid of bugs. Lugging a dirty mattress on your back for five blocks with a blood-alcohol content of three percent or so is not a fun thing. Try it if you don't believe me.

(Someone later told me that the mattress belonged to some homeless girl who kept her life in a backpack and spent her days bumming change off undergrads outside the Rutgers University Student Center. I felt a little guilty about stealing her bed. The least I could've done was buy her a drink or treated her to a round of miniature golf. But she really shouldn't have left it out there where anyone could take it).

Back at the flat, Gunner was lying on the front lawn. He was trying to convince someone to call an ambulance for him because he felt like he was going to die. But our friends are very callous people and no one felt like calling an ambulance.

"Just throw up. You'll feel fine," someone told him.

"I can't throw up. I really think I'm going to die."

I could sympathize with the poor bastard. People like dying even less than they like throwing up. Yet, they still prefer it to public speaking. I would have called for an ambulance myself, but I was having my own problems fitting the mattress through the door. I threw it down on the floor by the TV, which someone had tuned to the History Channel. A very interesting program about dirigibles was on.

My stomach was not ready for bed yet so I sat in a chair and concentrated very hard on not throwing up. On the television, an old man in a bow tie explained the difference between a zeppelin and a blimp. I tried to figure out who had convinced me to sandwich a Guinness between a kamikaze and a brain-death. Had it been my idea all along? What had I been hoping to accomplish?

At some point an ambulance came to pick up Gunner. A girl had fallen asleep on my mattress when I wasn't looking. This displeased me, especially because this particular girl and I had had a number of ill-considered sexual encounters in the past and surely the last thing I needed now was another one. But she had covered my mattress with a nice clean sheet and her pillow seemed big enough for us both to share. So I plopped down next to her, stole her blanket, and slept.

In the middle of the night I threw up all over her pillow. I think a little of it might have gotten in her hair. But not much.

This had the potential to be very embarrassing because no one likes to have their pillow thrown up on. People hate that even more than they hate throwing up themselves, but not quite as much as death or public speaking.

Everyone else was still sleeping so I thought I might be able to surreptitiously clean it up. Pouring water on the pillow seemed like a good idea. But all it did was make the pillow very wet. So I went outside to take a nap on the lawn.

Later that morning my bedmate asked me a simple question.

"Did you throw up on my pillow?"

"Of course not."

This was something of a foolish lie as she was holding up a pillow that was thoroughly soaked in vomit.

"It smells like someone threw up on it."

"Weird."

"If you didn't throw up on it, why is it all wet?"

"Oh. That. I poured a glass of water on it."

"Why did you pour a glass of water on my pillow?"

"How else was I supposed to clean it up after I threw up on it?"

The jig was up. Faced with such shrewd interrogation, I crumbled like a stale corn muffin. She was not amused – very angry, in fact. But this girl talked a lot and had done much to annoy me lately so I couldn't feel too bad about it. Anyway she shouldn't have been sleeping on my mattress.

Later that morning, the hospital called to tell us that Gunner had died of alcohol poisoning because he had not thrown up and the doctors had not been able to pump his stomach in time. Gunner was only 21 years and one day old. Actually, that part about Gunner dying is not so much true as it is a lie. Gunner was OK and even got a free hospital gown out of it. But, if he had died, the moral of this story would be that it's better to throw up on some girl's pillow than to not throw up and die in a hospital the morning after your 21st birthday.

addition of steam lines and other components for a new power plant, and the repair of the W.E.B DuBois Library deck.

Page isn't the only administrator with issues specific to his job facing him. Javier Cevallos, the University's Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs has already dealt with a major issue: the housing problem.

"The space available on this campus is always a major concern," Cevallos said, "and it is our responsibility to house everyone, and despite the problems, the housing people have done an amazing job as far as getting everyone on campus somewhere to be. We haven't turned away anyone."

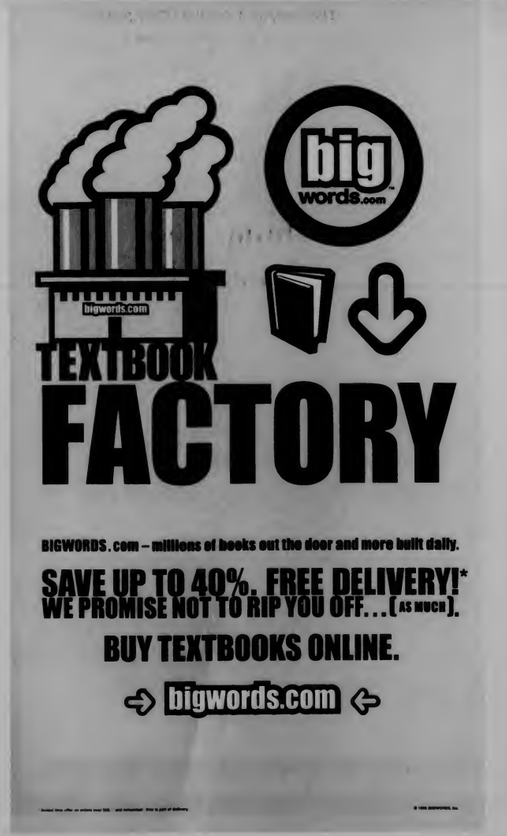
Cevallos went on to explain that the housing problem, in a way, was a good thing for the University.

"We have a large incoming class, and in spite of the problems that come along with that, this is a positive sign," Cevallos said. "Seventy-five percent of our incoming class is from within the state, and that goes to show how important we are to the Commonwealth."

He went on to explain that UMass is a "great teaching institution that must provide certain services to its students." Cevallos said the opening of the Commonwealth College presents the University with an opportunity to see how "that institution is going to work in our lives."

Cevallos is particularly excited about a new program for undergraduate parents who are on campus.

"That is a growing group of students on this campus, and we need to do our best to help those students out," Cevallos said.



Bracey, who said that he is excited to get back to his students and his projects, feels there are a few issues having the potential to cause controversy, including revision of the General Education requirements and discussion of the possibility of a four class/four credit system rather than the five class/three credit system that exists now.

"All of these have the potential to stir things up," Bracey said. "We also have the post-tenure review process for faculty and the retention of minority students to look at."

Bracey looks at the University with optimism, though.

"We go on through all of this chaos. People come in here, they get educated, and the get out on the other side," Bracey said. "The University of Massachusetts looks like a bumblebee in that it looks like it can't fly, and yet it always does."

Tricky to provide plenty of treats tonight

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

Tricky has done little to impress critics as of late. But the criticism he receives can only be expected after springing an album like Maxinquaye on us. Tricky's 1995 debut was met with such high praise that everything he has done since has fallen short of expectations. Cut the guy some slack. Let's see you try to create one of the most interesting and influential genres of music in the past decade.

The Bristol-born musician's work cannot be easily defined or pigeonholed into a restrictive category. It's not quite rap or hip-hop, not quite jazz, not quite techno and not quite rock; but rather an embodiment of all these genres. As American rap music was exported to England, the Brits decided to take the rough-edged abrasiveness and turn it into something a bit more atmospheric, but still true to the streets. Also influenced by rock and jazz, Bristol's "Wild Bunch" crew (which consisted of Tricky, members of Massive Attack and Portishead's Geoff Barrow among other DJs, MCs, singers and producers) brought guitars, electronics and even classical instruments to the hip-hop beats and scratching turntables. Out of the Wild Bunch spawned Massive Attack. Tricky, practically a member of Massive Attack at the time, collaborated with the group on their first album, 1991's Blue Lines. Working with the band through the next few years, most notably on the single "Karmacoma," Tricky began to detest the incestuous Bristol music scene and moved to London to work on a solo career.

On a visit back to Bristol, Tricky encountered a schoolgirl named Martina. After they took a liking to each other, he recruited her to do vocals on a song he had written. The song, "Aftermath," was released independently as a single and became wildly popular in the U.K. underground dance scene. Further collaborations with Martina brought about Tricky's first LP, Maxinquaye, titled for his mother, Maxine Quaye, who committed suicide when he was only four.

The album was an instant classic, taking one further step in defining the "trip-hop" genre (along with Blue Lines, and Portishead's Dummy). A variety of side projects followed, with some successes and some failures. The Nearly God album was a brilliant collaboration, pairing Tricky's beats with vocals by Bjork, Neneh Cherry and Terry Hall. His follow-up album to Maxinquaye, Pre-Millennium Tension, got a lukewarm reception. While it brought Tricky mainstream notice, it was accused of following the blueprint of its predecessor.

Tricky's latest release, last year's Angels With Dirty Faces, received mixed reviews, from raving to scathing. And although Angels was not able to top the excellence of Maxinquaye, the "Broken Homes" single managed to be quite entertaining, with the help of vocals from P.J. Harvey. Cypress Hill's DJ Muggs also performed on the new album.

Tonight in Northampton, everyone will get a chance to check out Tricky when he brings his dark beats and moody melodies to Pearl Street. It's rare that such an act comes to the area, so take the opportunity while you can.

Tricky will be performing tonight at Pearl Street Nightclub (Ballroom) in Northampton at 8:30p.m. Subtext, DJ Genacide 2 andThe Baby Namboos will open the show. Tickets are $18.50 in advance, and are available at For the Record in Amherst, Northampton Box Office, or by calling 1-800-TIH-TICK. Tickets are $20.50 at the door.

Rap flows into mainstream

By Dave Katzoff
Collegian Staff

Greetings scrubs, pigeons and hater players. In the appropriate words of Naughty By Nature's Vin Rock, "once again it's on!"

Yes indeedy, I have emerged to typographically shadowbox with the culture and politics of urban sound and style. First time readers be warned: this column often contains material that is manifested in the subterranean, brewed and fermented amidst the organic elements of hip-hop, and journalistically spurned with the intention of uncaging the artists and aspects that receive minimal notoriety. So, a rap map of the pop charts this is not. However, since rap (or rap's influence) did in fact dominate Billboard music this summer, it seems fitting to begin by expounding upon the putrid subject of its saturated popularity.

This past July I was flipping through the radio when I landed on an interesting new station called lammin' Oldies. Immediately I paused my surf of the frequency module air-waves, as I realized the song playing was "The Way We Were" by Gladis Knight and the Pips. Adjusting the volume upwards, I began to marginally sing along, "can it be that it was oh so simple..." The tune, of course was hooked by Wu-Tang in 1993 and as the words sunk in, I was overcome by a feeling of empty nostalgia. Regrettably, that prophetic phrase underlines a saddening denotation for hip-hop today.

At its core, the simplicity of rap's execution has been perhaps its most complex component. Yet, ever-increasingly, hip-hop is drifting away from this complexity and becoming more complicated, thugmatic and downright chaotic. The density of its substance (documented throughout last year) is continuously extracted as the culture becomes metaphorically similar to a pig on a roasting pit: while one side never sees the flames of the fire, the flip side is burned, over-cooked and feasted upon by vultures. For evidence, check out the type of background dance attempted in Britney Spears videos. Or peep the aesthetic verbal discourse exemplified in the rhyming styles of rock/rap hybrid groups like Limp Bizkit, Korn, Kid Rock and Insane Clown Posse. Or, if you really have a thick constitution, listen to the way J.F.O. bites to replicate the reminiscent sing-song-style of countless emcees in their hit "Summer Girls (Abercrombie & Fitch)." Synonymous to eating swine, digesting these larcenies of rap straight up makes me sick. And to make matters worse, the purists who thrive on the realism of unadulterated hip-hop are blatantly losing the battle. (See Q-Tip's single "Vivrant.") The music industry, which is the driving force in commodifying and colonizing an urban dichotomy, is pumping out this commercial rap tread between the lines) at alarming rates.

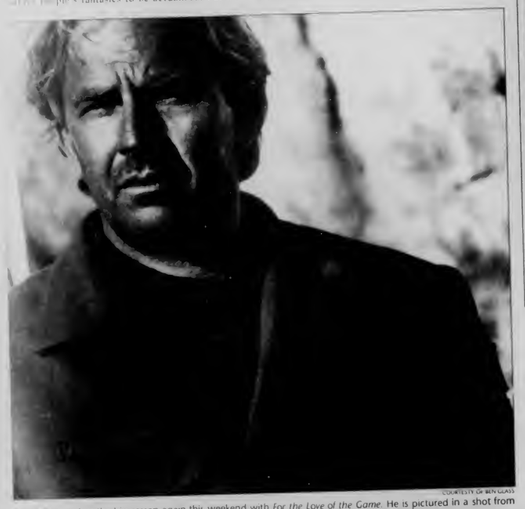
For the Love of The Game opens this Friday and with it, memories are hearkened back to Kevin Costner's glory days. Back before the ill conceived Jet Cage, before the self-indulgent The Postman, and back before the utterly despicable Waterworld.

Clearly, we are reminded of baseball ... of Bull Durham, one of my favorite baseball movie. Field Of Dreams. Field is one of the rare instances when a movie can talk about magical things about dead ball players residing somewhere in Iowa, and still have a spiritual quality about it.



No matter how many times I see the film, I still can relate to Terrance Mann (James Earl Jones) starts his speech about baseball, "The one constant through all the years, Ray, has been baseball. America has been rolled by the tides of steamrollers ... The speech manages to capture the movie's charm and it's grace with one ringing declaration. It's almost as if the movie itself is a baseball, too complete, or too rich to be true.

Field of Dreams is magical, not only because Ray's field of corn people's fantasies to be actualized, but also because it raises a sense of nostalgia in the audience. The simplicity of baseball is contrasted with the power of emotion that this child's game can evoke. Baseball is inherently tied to Ray's youth and to the wishes of the people whom he seeks to help. Baseball is inherently tied to this country's social fabric, to Americana.

And despite these powerful realizations, the movie is ultimately about relationships. It is about a journey, one man's quest to connect with his past and to discover how his life came to be. Field of Dreams is profound without ever being truly corny or even over-sentimental.

Ray Liotta, a candidate for one of the best casting choices ever, mesmerizes us with his piercing blue eyes. He's the epitome of a vibrant ghost. James Earl Jones lulls us with his deep, smooth voice. And Kevin Costner puts it all together. He's not an action hero, or a golf star, or even a sailor; he's every man. Everyone has thrown reason out the window, at least once in their life to follow something indescribable, something that's abstract, something that doesn't even make sense.

Costner gives the movie its purpose. It's his journey and ultimately his dream. The major accomplishment of Field of Dreams though, is to make it our journey and our dream, too.

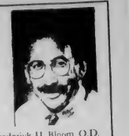
Safe school busing

By Carrie Donovan
The Washington Post



Although school buses are relatively safe, more than 6,000 children were involved in school bus-related accidents in 1997. To avoid accidents, children should take precautions, including arriving at the bus stop early and avoiding horseplay.

They also should be made aware that the driver has a 10-foot blind spot in front of the bus. If your children walk or bike to school, make sure to teach them the rules of the road.

Bobby is in a huge state of confusion. It seems that the only thing Bobby has figured out about women is that they are female. Everything he has learned about women he has learned from other men. Over the course of 90 minutes you will meet five different characters, all performed by Robert Dubac, that have helped to make Bobby the confused man he is today. Men and women alike will love this uproarious one-man show.

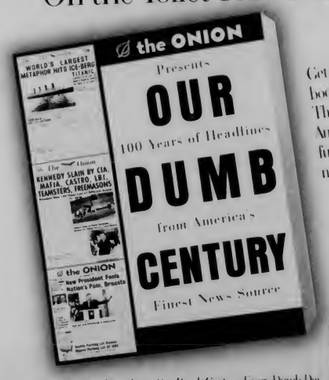
Personalized candy wrappers



By Kim Reilly
Kidsday Staff Reporter

Are you looking for a really unique favor for a special party or event? Something that really expresses who you are? Then Moosie Wrappers are for you. Moosie Wrappers are chocolate candy bars with wrappers you can personalize. These affordable candy bars (24 cost $59.95 plus shipping) can be used for birthday parties, weddings, baby announcements, retirement parties or anything else you can think of. To personalize the wrappers, you can choose a photo of yourself, a family member, a friend or a variety of other graphics, as well as numerous backgrounds. The text can say just about anything you want, from your hobbies and special interests to the date of your birthday. The candy bar gets eaten, but the wrapper becomes a keepsake. For information about ordering Moosie Wrappers call (614) 876-8723, or visit the Web site at www.moosiewrapper.com

Dorm room packing

By Denis Horgan
The Hartford Courant

Considering the infamous Black Hole of Calcutta, an august college leader [illegible] and humanitarianism would surely reflect on the depravity and barbarism which saw British prisoners crammed into a tiny, squalid prison [illegible] of which 24 by 18 feet. "A ghastly, terrible thing," he would think.

Or, so he might think. "I could house 36 kids in that hole and charge them [illegible] for staying at the Ritz."

In the Ritz Boot school of college dorms, the Black Hole would be primo real [illegible].

On campuses everywhere, our young scholars are being crowded into tiny little [illegible] through polici-, guile or ineptitude many of the schools are shoe-horning three youths into two-person rooms, four in rooms barely equipped for [illegible]. Clammy that they had no clue that they themselves were admitting so many students and that those kids might actually need to be housed rather than, say, [illegible] in the air, they jam the students into tiny quarters such as monks and mail [illegible]. They double-dip on the space. Brilliant.

In fact, those rooms are only about the size of a steamer trunk to begin with. [illegible] again, a steamer trunk would feel like the Grand Canyon compared to [illegible] young people get for their big money.

The schools get away with Hong Kongeing, a miniaturized, planned-over-[illegible] program that would have the zoning cops called in were it in any other [illegible] than the sacred groves of academe, where the highest powers of academe [illegible] and nearly entirely on coming up with new ways to fleece the poor sap stu-[illegible] and its increasingly poorer parents.

With tuitions routinely rivaling the cost of an annual luxury automobile, with [illegible] whatever as to why they rise so stratospherically, and with books [illegible] that solas cost and uncountable fees soaring while the sighting of an actu-[illegible] rather than a teaching assistant is reason to call the Audubon Society, [illegible] that it should come as no surprise that dormitory housing is the latest tar-[illegible] opportunity for the ever-prowling money magnets of college administration.

At schools here and elsewhere dorm rooms of 8 by 18 feet rival the Marx Brothers' bulging stateroom in A Night at the Opera. One hundred and forty-four square feet for three kids, three stereos (the security blanket of the age), three com-[illegible], three toothbrushes, one bar of soap, three lockers, three beds and 303 [illegible]. I have seen kids in rooms where they are lucky to have 10 square feet each [illegible] all the year. Truly.

Stacked up like the eternal rappers of the catacombs, students entrusted with [illegible] future of the world are layered like levels in a road cut, crowded into rooms the [illegible] lockers down at the YMCA.

This, decided upon by college officials who, themselves, wouldn't dream of [illegible] confined to the cubbyholes they assign our children, at our expense. (Full [illegible] Department: My own bosses, sitting in offices the size of tennis courts, [illegible] contrast to command that our "work stations" be so small that it is not possible [illegible] them to open up a news-paper – something you might even want to do, [illegible] work on a news-paper, after all. Their desks are bigger than our entire stalls.)

A phone booth has about 5 square feet, and you can imagine the college lead-[illegible] lamenting the wasted space when they could put two students in the space and [illegible] a small fortune in the bargain. Or four in the average, 15-square foot toilet [illegible]. A mailbox, using up nearly 4 square feet is space enough for your standard [illegible] world neatly packaways every item with the efficiency of a space station [illegible] everything clean and tidy and in its place.

Universes at Bowker Friday

This weekend Bowker Auditorium will be visited by the tenor of New York City subways, tourist-free streets, prisons, and the struggles that reside in these less explored places when the New World Theatre presents Universes in "U Fresh Out of the Box."

Born from a cultural center for youth in the Bronx, Universes is a novel mix of poetry/hip-hop/funk/vocals. It was co-founded two years ago by Stephen Sapp and Mildred Ruiz to address contemporary questions about government and its hold on society, authority and racism, with a foremost goal of representing urban life on the stage.

Universes defies convention and plays with unprecedented combinations of theatrical devices. New York's Village Voice has described them "as likely to kick some poetry as they are to break out into a cappella singing, to orchestrate a vocal exercise as they are to burst into a step show…Their energy and realness is unmatchable."

Performances are scheduled for September 17 and 18, 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. For tickets and more information you can contact the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511.

Stoney makes case to be Baltimore's backup

By Gary Lambrecht
The Baltimore Sun

OWINGS MILLS, Md. – Baltimore Ravens Coach Brian Billick has refused to say any quarterback controversy exists on his team, although the position has started to resemble a derby in recent days.

One slot is clear, for now. Scott Mitchell, coming off a rough outing in the season-opening 27-10 loss to the St. Louis Rams Sunday, will start against the visiting Pittsburgh Steelers in Sunday's home opener. The depth chart gets interesting after that.

Less than a month after signing with the Ravens, former No. 3 quarterback Stoney Case has been elevated to No. 2, meaning another shaky performance by Mitchell could thrust Case into action against the Steelers.

Then there is backup Tony Banks, whom the Ravens acquired from St. Louis on draft day in exchange for a fifth-round pick this year and a sixth-round choice next year.

After beginning training camp as the backup ahead of former No. 3 man Wally Richardson, he was cut after Case joined the team. Banks stumbled in camp, recovered with some electrifying moments early in the preseason, but has been his stock slip again.

Several teams have contacted the Ravens in the past two weeks about trading for Banks. With the league trading deadline Oct. 19, the Ravens would like to get a third-round pick for him but probably would settle for a fourth-rounder. If Banks leaves town, the Ravens may consider bringing back Richardson to fill his old role.

"Scott Mitchell is a proven quarterback, and I think he will show what he is capable of doing, but there are no guarantees whatsoever," Billick said.

"Just look around the league. At any given instance, whether it's due to injury, whether it's a quarterback playing poorly, changes are made. The bottom line is not about personal stats. It's about: Is he moving the team? I have no reason to believe that anybody can move this team better than Scott Mitchell right now."

Banks, who has started 43 games in his four-year career, has not accepted his demotion without some expected grumbling. On Monday, he left the team's Owings Mills facility immediately after a brief workout. He was unavailable for comment yesterday, the players' day off.

"I'm sure (Banks) is not happy about it. I don't know how any player would be in that position. Tony understands, like all players have to, their roles call for certain things," Billick said. "It's not unlikely that teams, if not now, then in the future, will be contacting us about a third quarterback who has a great deal of experience."

At 27 and in his fifth season, Case has virtually no playing experience. Originally drafted in the third round by the Arizona Cardinals in 1995, he played in only four games and started one over the next four seasons, before moving on to the Indianapolis Colts six months ago, presumably to be Peyton Manning's backup.

The Colts, who signed Case to a two-year deal that included a $500,000 signing bonus, surprised many observers by cutting Case and opting for Steve Walsh, after Case played well in training camp.

Case, 6 feet 3, 206 pounds, signed with the Ravens on Aug. 17, then immersed himself in Billick's playbook. He caught Billick's eye by engineering game-winning drives in the last two preseason victories over the Carolina Panthers and New York Giants.

Guerrero plays big in small Montreal

By Paul Gutierrez
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES — In another era, he'd be an MVP candidate.

In another city, he'd be a superstar.

But Vladimir Guerrero is playing in a baseball wasteland, and he likes it. Not only is he content, the 23-year-old Expo right fielder is thriving as, get this, a Spanish-speaking Dominican playing America's pastime in the French-Canadian city of Montreal.

"The experience has been good for me because this is still the major leagues and it's a good job to go to work to every day," Guerrero said in Spanish on Monday night at Dodger Stadium after hitting his 36th home run of the year, a two-run shot, in the Expos' 12-4 loss to the Dodgers. "I've felt really welcomed in Montreal. The people salute me and welcome me when I'm just walking down the street."

Two years ago, people were giving him directions, not handshakes.

Remember, this is a guy whose one-time roommate, Pedro Martinez, made sure Guerrero had their Montreal address written on a piece of paper in his pocket should he ever get lost.

With the five-year contract extension Guerrero signed Sept. 1, 1998 to remain with the Expos through the 2003 season, he'll have more than enough time to learn the side streets and back roads of Montreal, if the franchise doesn't move.

And that's fine with Expo Manager Felipe Alou.

"He's a phenom, though he's still swinging at a lot of bad pitches. But when he gets a pitch to hit, he kills it," said Alou, who also re-upped with the Expos last winter, signing a three-year deal. "The prediction was made when Vladi was 17 years old that he was going to be something special, that he was going to be a great player. He's right on target."

It's only Guerrero's second full season in the majors, but already the 6-foot-3, 205-pound man-child with braces in his mouth and a canon for an arm has established himself as an all-around player in the mold of Roberto Clemente.

His stats thus far, a .302 batting average, 36 homers, 113 RBI, are almost identical to the numbers he put up last year, a franchise-record 38 homers while batting .324 with 109 RBIs. This season, his 15 assists rank third in the National League, although his 17 errors top major league outfielders.

Fifteen or 20 years ago, his offensive figures would have been Triple Crown-worthy. But in today's age of rabbit balls and andro, Guerrero is merely the next superstar-in-waiting.

And though holding Montreal franchise records may be as dubious an honor as being a former member of Menudo not named Ricky Martin, Guerrero is the first Expo to have 30 or more homers in consecutive seasons. He's also the first Expo with at least 100 RBI two years in a row. Only power-hitting catcher Gary Carter had more than one 100-RBI season while in Montreal.

This year, he has realistic shots at breaking his own homer mark as well as surpassing Tim Wallach's RBI record of 123, set in 1987.

Guerrero doesn't like to talk about such individual pursuits, especially because he started out a bit slow this year. But he caught fire after serving as the Expos' all-star representative in Boston this summer.

His 31-game hitting streak from July 27-August 26 was the majors' longest of the decade. And after batting .355 with 12 homers, 29 RBI and a .742 slugging percentage in August, he was named the NL player of the month.

How did he celebrate? By taking a well-deserved day off Aug. 31. It was the first game he had missed since April 19, 1998, ending his consecutive games streak at 276, which was then the third-longest current streak in the majors.

Guerrero's older brother Wilton, who joined the Expos when the Dodgers traded him July 31, 1998, said that the small-market intimacy of Montreal has fostered his brother's maturation.

"Plus, he now knows a little more English," Wilton Guerrero said. "He's getting more comfortable. And when you have the family and friends (on the same team) speaking Spanish and English, he learns more."

Alou, the second Dominican to play in the major leagues, has created a haven of sorts for Latino ballplayers in the Montreal clubhouse. The Guerreros are two of 12 foreign-born Latins on the Expo roster.

"It helps and you do feel more comfortable, but you've got to play hard no matter who's the manager, who's on the team. You've got to do your job," said Wilton, who has acted as a liaison between not only his brother and management types, but also for the team's other players that speak only Spanish. "After the job, having the language makes it better for the manager, better for everyone."

sate for this cheap-win factor. Then, what have we got? Instead of a sport with eight teams on a fancy pace for 96 to 101 wins, we get a more honest picture. We should ask: Does baseball have even one truly excellent team in '99? The Braves might've been, if their season hadn't been one long "ER" episode.

To answer the question, let's step back and make sure we're not overlooking any elephants in the room. One of baseball's simplest numbers is also often the deepest. Just add up the entire season as though it were one game: runs for vs. runs against. Big truths jump out. Lots of teams outscore their foes by 100 runs in a year. It proves little. But not many beat the league by 200 runs. It's a big deal only done 13 times in the last 30 years, always by teams with title potential. As for a 300 run edge, it's virtually unheard of. Last season the Yanks were the first to do it since the 1939 Yanks.

Bruins in ruin doin' quarterback shuffle

By Bill Plaschke
Los Angeles Times

COLUMBUS, Ohio – Less than a week after writing that Cory Paus should eventually be the UCLA quarterback, a red-faced observer cupped his hands over his mouth when Paus trotted on to the field here Saturday night and yelled like heck.

"No! No! No!"

Two hours later, the same observer watched Paus take the same field, run into the same huddle, and promptly cupped the same hands over the same mouth.

"Yes! Yes! Yes!"

Stop this quarterback rotation. I want to get off.

A credible performance by many kids on suspension thin UCLA here Saturday despite what a 42-20 Ohio State victory may look like was marred by an increasingly suspect situation with their leader.

Or, leaders.

Or, whatever.

That was Paus' word afterward.

"Whatever," he said when asked if he was growing weary of the situation.

Counterpart Drew Bennett offered the same tired look.

"I don't really pay much attention to it," he said.

Then Bennett was the only one not watching Saturday when after leading UCLA toscores on two of its first three possessions, he was removed from the game.

Why? It was in the script, Hollywood and all that, remember? Bennett was going to run three series, Paus was going to run three series, and the coaches were going to reevaluate at halftime. Nobody counted on a surprise beginning, as in, UCLA leading 10-7 with Bennett as its leader.

The rowdy red-draped crowd and creaky Ohio Stadium was quiet. The revered Buckeye band had its white gloves on its lips. The Bruins had a chance.

Then Paus came into the game, everybody exhaled, and that chance was lost. The Bruins, who had gained 162 yards in three series under Bennett, gained 15 years in two second-quarter series under Paus.

When he left, that 10-7 lead was a 21-10 deficit.

By the time Bennett started the second half, despite an initial runheavy touchdown drive, it was clear that he had also exhaled, and was never the same. So Paus replaced him in the fourth quarter and finally moved the team only to have Brad Melsby and Danny Farmer each drop a pass in the end zone. Either catch would have put UCLA within a touchdown and a field goal with plenty of time remaining. Instead, the Bruins settled for a field goal, and ended the game having never quite started.

Confused yet?

And folks here thought watching that band write that funny script Ohio was dizzying.

This will probably be remembered by Ohio State fans as the game in which the Buckeyes found their 1999 quarterback. They began the game in a similar rotation as the Bruins, but a sophomore Steve Bellisari took charge, and that was that.

For UCLA, this will be the game that the search stretched painfully onward.

It still says here that Paus is the guy.

But after watching the offense struggle to find consistent footing under either guy Saturday, it would be great if Bob Toledo just picked somebody and stuck with him.

Just like he stuck with Cade McNown and his young buddies several years ago.

There was a time, in fact, when McNown and his pals came skipping onto the field of another Big Ten powerhouse, and left there soaked in discouragement.

The year was 1996. The team was Michigan. The final score was 38-9. That season, the Bruins were 5-6. Many losses, but one team, one group of players, and one mission. Two seasons later, that same team nearly won a national championship. If UCLA truly is going to rebuild this year, maybe it should give its quarterback the same consistent chances it is giving its other young players.

"Not a lot of difference to me who plays quarterback," said Freddie Mitchell. "Neither one of them was throwing the ball to me."

Come to think of it, make Mitchell the quarterback. He's the most exciting player on the field, and Saturday he completed one more pass then he caught. With no continuity at quarterback, there is no continuity at wide receiver, or running back, or even the offensive line.

Would Melsby or Farmer have dropped Paus' fourth-quarter bullets if they had grown accustomed to catching them earlier in the game?

"Sometimes it's a little harder," Paus acknowledged.

The biggest shame is Bob Toledo and Al Borges are still concocting offenses that can win games, if only they had the leader to do it. Many times Saturday, it was clear the Bruins had fooled an Ohio State team that had two weeks to prepare for them. But almost never did the Bruins have the timing to pull it off. That stuff is found out in games and in practice, with the same group of players, over and over again. One of those players, not coincidentally, must be the guy taking the snap.

"We may go two games with it, we may go three games with it, I'm not going to make any big decisions right now," Toledo said late Saturday.

The Golden Boy battles The Cat in Vegas

By Steve Springer
Los Angeles Times

LAS VEGAS – It's not easy to impress a city that has a Statue of Liberty, an Eiffel Tower and pyramids. And it's certainly not easy to make a financial dent in a town where billions are wagered yearly.

But when welterweight boxers Oscar De La Hoya and Felix Trinidad square off here Saturday, many who work or play in this city will be paying attention, as well as money to watch the fight, bet on it or both.

They will not be the only ones. Interest is so high that De La Hoya and Trinidad, both unbeaten and considered the best welterweights in the world, will be fighting in the richest non-heavyweight bout ever.

Everything about this fight except the 147-pound fighters is big, from its reach to its revenue. The fight will be seen in more than 60 countries, from Malaysia to Venezuela, to South Africa to Iceland. The pay-per-view total is expected to reach a million buys at a basic price of $49.95. De La Hoya alone is guaranteed at least $21 million. Trinidad $10.5 million.

As for seeing the fight live, forget it. The 12,000 seats in the Mandalay Bay Events Center were snapped up by the sponsoring hotels and promoters before the public had a shot at them. But scalpers are selling tickets for as much as $7,000 each. The average for prime locations, though, is more like $3,500-$4,000.

As many as 40,000 theater seats at closed-circuit showings have been sold, and the total is rising daily.

Betting on the fight, De La Hoya is a 6-5 favorite. The duel is expected to equal the action for college football or the National Football League next weekend, said Vince Magliulo of Caesars Place. No official figures are available, but that means millions of dollars.

All this for a sport that was left for dead two years ago at Las Vegas' MGM Grand Garden Arena, where Mike Tyson had bitten off a piece of Evander Holyfield's ear in their heavyweight title rematch.

But boxing has been put back on its feet and carried to this new height largely by De La Hoya, the most marketable face in the game, and one of the most popular athletes in the world.

His timing couldn't have been better. He arrived on the scene just as Latinos were poised to exert their economic force, and just as pay-per-view television was taking off.

When De La Hoya emerged from Barcelona, Spain, in 1992 with an Olympic gold medal, he knew there was more gold awaiting him back home.

Having grown up in East Los Angeles, De La Hoya was eager to give his family the good life. For signing his first professional contract, he wanted a long-term, million-dollar package that included, upfront a house, car, van and cash totaling nearly $100,000 for his father, Joel, and his trainer, Robert Alcazar.

De La Hoya got his wish. What has followed has been beyond his imagining. The fighter known as "the Golden Boy" has turned into the Midas man. At 26, Oscar De La Hoya has generated more money than any non-heavyweight in the history of a sport that stretches back more than a century.

In Saturday's showdown, De La Hoya's 32nd professional fight, he will surpass $100 million in purse money for his career.

The fight is not only expected to break financial records for non-heavyweights, but to move into monetary territory previously ruled by the heavyweights.

For example:

If De La Hoya-Trinidad reaches 1 million pay-per-view buys, it will be the first non-heavyweight bout to do so. The fight needs only half a million buys to break even.

In Puerto Rico, where Trinidad lives, the percentage of homes buying the fight is already up to 15 percent-16 percent of the 200,000 outlets capable of receiving it. Considering that 90 percent of pay-per-view buys normally are made in the last few days before a fight, more than a third of Puerto Rico may buy this fight.

By comparison, a million buys in the continental United States would represent about 2.5 percent of the TV sets capable of receiving pay-per-view.

The record for non-heavyweights was set by a De La Hoya bout, his 1997 victory over Pernell Whitaker, which hit 760,000 buys. The all-time record is 1.75 million buys for the 1997 rematch between heavyweights Tyson and Holyfield.

The live gate, the value of the tickets outstanding, at the Mandalay Bay Events Center is about $13.5 million, although many of those in attendance will not have paid. Mandalay Bay and Paris Las Vegas Casino Resort, Mandalay's partner in this venture, paid the promoters $10 million-$11 million for the right to stage the fight. That gave the hotel control of tickets, minus those promised to the promoters, and it has given them away for the publicity value, to lure high-rollers, and to reward big gamblers. If certain financial goals are reached, there's even a chance at a small profit.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team hosts the UMass Classic this weekend. They open play when they take on Siena at 4 p.m. at Totman Field.

Monday night, Elway's heir apparent showed the best of things to come, albeit in a losing effort. Brian Griese's performance (24-of-40, 270 yards, 3 TD's, 0 INT's) could stand on its own merit, but looks even more impressive when compared to the lackluster showings of several "proven veterans" on Sunday (Steve Young, Scott Mitchell, and Elvis Grbac spring to mind).

And while Lion QB Charlie Batch (16-of-26, 216 yards, 3 TD's) may have stolen the spotlight in Detroit's 28-20 win over the Seahawks, there is no question that the Lion backfield played a huge part in chapter one of life-after-Barry. When WR Herman Moore left the game early with an injury, Coach Bobby Ross let his RB tandem of Ron Rivers and Cory Schlesinger run loose on Seattle, and the pair did not disappoint. Combining for 146 yards on 26 carries, Rivers and Schlesinger left only one question concerning the Lions' rushing game: Barry who?

In golf news, Texan Bob Estes was seen shooting a practice round at The Country Club in Brookline on Monday, and speculation is that Estes is gearing up to take Davis Love III's spot on the U.S. Ryder Cup team. Love is at home in Sea Island, Georgia, nursing a pinched nerve in his back.

Two linksters who will definitely represent the stars and stripes in international play are Payne Stewart and Mark O'Meara, slated to tee off in this year's Alfred Dunhill Cup in St. Andrews, Scotland on Oct. 7. The two Floridians will face fierce competition from the South African team of Ernie Els, David Frost, and Retief Goosen, who have captured the last two Dunhill Cups.

In roundball news, high school phenom Tamir Goodman turned down a scholarship offer from the University of Maryland Saturday, reportedly due to conflicts between the school's hoop schedule and Goodman's religious beliefs. The 6'3", 159-lb shooting guard averaged over 35 points-per-game for the Talmudical Academy, a Jewish day school near Baltimore, over a three-year career. After verbally agreeing to play for Coach Gary Williams' Terrapins, Goodman rescinded after Williams' refusal to excuse him from Saturday workouts. Saturday is the Sabbath, or day of rest, in the Jewish religion.

And in the poor-get-poorer department, the New Jersey Nets lost center Jayson Williams until at least January when the South Carolina native underwent arthroscopic surgery on his right knee Tuesday. Williams, who averaged 8 points and 12 boards in 30 games for the Nets last year, signed a six-year contract worth $85 million before the '98-'99 season.

Griese shines at Mile High; Denver tripped up in Elway's return

By T.J. Simers
Los Angeles Times

DENVER – The Denver Broncos missed tackles all Monday night, the biggest coming at the half, when they should have piled on John Elway en masse, begging him not to let the Broncos retire his jersey and install him in the Ring of Fame.

To heck with the fireworks, television fanfare and all the little tykes running around the field wearing No. 7 across their shirts. To heck with his aching knees, 39 birthdays and the tearful farewell months ago. To heck with any chance of the Broncos becoming the first team in NFL history to win three consecutive Super Bowls.

Brian Griese is a nice young man, his father rightfully proud, and Denver will be as good as any team in the AFC West.

But the Broncos do not have the look of world champions with Griese under center, slow to hand the ball to Terrell Davis and unable to fire a scare into the opposition with an arm bred for finesse rather than power.

And so the Broncos are 0-1 one game removed from the John Elway era, 38-21 losers to the Miami Dolphins, who have the strut to be this year's AFC East Division champions now that the Jets have been grounded by Vinny Testaverde's season-ending injury.

"We're not playing for John Elway; we're playing for the guys in this locker room," said a defiant Denver linebacker Bill Romanowski. "John Elway will never be forgotten, but he's not playing anymore."

That became very evident as TV sets across the country undoubtedly clicked to other exciting fare. On a night in which Denver was asked to pay its rowdy respects to a quarterback known best for his gritty comebacks, Mile High Stadium sat less than half full at the two-minute warning in the fourth quarter. A winning streak of 24 games at home gone, along with Elway.

"Losing a player like John Elway certainly puts a lot more stress on the offense," said Denver defensive tackle Mike Lodish. "But the offense did a decent job."

That's not enough for a team seeking to make NFL history, and so now the final Elway chapter has been written, the Broncos beginning anew with who knows what to expect.

Thirty years ago almost to the day, Bob Griese made his NFL debut, replacing an injured John Stofa for the Dolphins, a second-year expansion team. Griese completed 12 of 19 passes for 193 yards with two touchdowns to lead Miami past Denver 35-21. He would start great, play better with time and land in the Hall of Fame.

Finishing with almost the same score, this time reversed, in defeat the younger Griese completed 24 of 40 passes for 270 yards and three touchdowns, lacking only the big effective finish.

"I think if everyone would have played like Brian Griese, we would have won the football game," said Denver Coach Mike Shanahan. "I was pleased with the way he handled himself against an excellent defensive football team. He showed a lot of poise and a lot of composure, but collectively we have to play better."

Shanahan to the defense, of course, is not surprising. This was going to be Bubby Brister's team, Brister ceremoniously moving into Elway's locker and taking command of this team. But Brister apparently didn't cut it during preseason auditions, although there is the suspicion that Shanahan thought so highly of his own directing skills, he was looking for the opportunity to defy NFL tradition and triumph with inexperience.

Sather/Sinden team up in financial grapple with teams' franchise players

By Paul Doyle
The Hartford Courant

BOSTON – In Edmonton, Oilers coach Kevin Lowe is preparing for a season without his best forward.

In Wilmington, Mass., Bruins coach Pat Burns is considering life without his No. 1 goaltender.

The link between the training camp boycotts of Bill Guerin and Byron Dafoe? Those thrifty fishing buddies, Oilers general manager Glen Sather and Bruins GM Harry Sinden.

In an industry where salaries are soaring, Sather and Sinden have their feet firmly fixed in another era. Both pride themselves on being tough negotiators who won't be bullied by agents.

But as training camp enters its second week, their posturing will make life difficult for their coaches.

Lowe, starting his first season as coach, has reportedly said he does not expect Guerin to be with the team.

What does the loss of Guerin mean? He is a physical presence who had 30 goals and 64 points in his first full season with the Oilers. Guerin earned $1.5 million last year and is seeking a salary comparable to the $4 million the Hurricanes will pay Keith Primeau (30 goals, 62 points).

"(Guerin) doesn't have the stats," Sather said.

So Guerin is in New Jersey, working out at Montclair State University. There are rumors Sather will let Guerin sit through camp before trading him.

"I'm not asking for a trade," Guerin told the Edmonton Sun. "I want to play in Edmonton."

If agent Bob Murray doesn't blink soon, Guerin's days in Edmonton may be over. Guerin would probably settle for about $3 million a season, but that still may be too expensive for Sather.

Sather is using the Bruins' stance with Dimitri Khristich as a model for negotiations with Guerin.

When an arbitrator awarded Khristich a $2.8 million salary, Sinden walked away and Khristich became an unrestricted free agent. The way Sather sees it, Guerin is a less productive player than Khristich (71 points) and should be paid less than $2.8 million.

The Bruins replaced Khristich with the aging Dave Andreychuk, who had 15 goals in 52 games for the Devils last season. In Bruins camp, the loss of Khristich's 29 goals is overshadowed by the absence of one of the top goaltenders in the NHL last season.

Dafoe had a 1.98 goals-against average and was a finalist for the Vezina Trophy. An unrestricted free agent, Dafoe is seeking about $4 million a season a salary that would place him in the same tax bracket as Martin Brodeur. Sinden called a proposal from Dafoe's agent "a shakedown" and said Dafoe must take his team to the Stanley Cup finals before he will be paid as an elite goaltender.

As Burns oversees a team with Rob Tallas as the No. 1 goalie, Dafoe is working out in California. Sinden has said negotiations could carry into the regular season, a sign the Bruins won't bend.

And the Bruins have other holes. Defenseman Hal Gill, who played in 80 games last season, and forward P.J. Axelsson (77 games) are holding out. Forward Tim Taylor, a defensive specialist, was lost to the Rangers as a free agent.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Though you are known for your honesty and candid talk, you are likely to encounter one today who has you beaten in his willingness to "tell all."
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Try to keep disagreements and personal conflicts to a minimum today. Your duties are many and the time available to you must be used well.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You know what you're doing, and you can demonstrate your experience with style throughout the day. You'll attract numerous supporters.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may be in a position which requires you to "lay down the law" despite your usually tolerant and forgiving attitude. Don't hedge!
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may have to connect with someone today who is more willing and able to deal with harsh financial realities. With guidance, you can prevail.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may not be as adept at expressing yourself today as you had expected. You may have to rely on someone else to get the more difficult ideas across.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Environmental influences may steer you in surprising directions today, despite any plans you may have that are "set in stone." Be flexible!
ARIES (March 20-April 19) – If you have the chance to get a little ahead of the game today, do so. Later, you may find that time is ticking away and you're running behind.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – A question of commitment and integrity is likely to arise today, and you have what it takes to come through any personal trial successfully.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Someone is likely to inform you that you have recently made, at least in his or her eyes, some wrong decisions. Is an about-face necessary?
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Someone you know and love is likely to need your help today in a big way, and you must be prepared to set aside your own desires temporarily.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – There is no reason for you to be hasty today, nor must you hesitate. Risks are few, and the chances of success at this time are increasing.

My mom's been raising me all by herself. She doesn't have much money. Sometimes she's so busy.

She bought me a whole bunch of new clothes and left them on my bed on Friday afternoon.

I really appreciated it so I left her a note on the kitchen table, before I went camping for the weekend.

"THANKS FOR EVERYTHING GOODBYE."

She thought it was a suicide note and went crazy crying all over the neighborhood, and calling everyone on the phone.

Me and my friends thought it was funny.

Sometimes she is so funny.

Sox rediscover winning ways; NFL kicks off

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Luckily for Red Sox Nation, the bomb scare only lasted 24 hours...

After Monday's 11-7 stinker in Cleveland, it appeared as if the Bosox were poised for one of their classic crunch-time nosedives. The Oakland A's had mercifully finished off the Little League World Series Champion Tampa Bay Devil Rays, cutting the precious wild card lead down to two games.

Boston's Pat Rapp, projected to start last night, was a late scratch after flying home to Louisiana to accompany his wife through a difficult pregnancy. Having used both Bryce Florie and Tomokazu Ohka in mop-up roles Monday, Manager Jimy Williams reluctantly handed the ball to Ramon Martinez (0-1, 9.00 ERA) yesterday. The Fenway faithful couldn't bear to watch...

But instead of buckling under, the Sox showed more of the junkyard-dog toughness that has kept them in the race thus far in '99, pounding the Tribe 12-3 behind the stellar stickwork of Jose Offerman (4-for-4) and Troy O'Leary (four RBI). Martinez showed vast improvement, striking out five in four-plus innings, while Derek Lowe (6-3) got the win with three innings of scoreless relief.

More good news came via the A.L. scoreboard, as Baltimore thrashed Oakland 13-6 to restore the three-game wild card cushion.

Elsewhere in the American League, Chicago slugger Frank Thomas underwent season-ending surgery on his right foot Monday, surgery that was originally scheduled to take place after the '99 season. While some critics pointed to the Big Hurt's sub-par power numbers this year (15 HR, 77 RBI) as the obvious reason for moving up the operation, it was more than likely the mathematical elimination of the ChiSox from A.L. Central contention (Cleveland clinched the division over the weekend) that put Thomas under the knife early.

Over in the Senior Circuit, Bobby Valentine's Metropolitans continued to gear up for the stretch run, dealing RHP Dan Murray to Kansas City on Tuesday for Southpaw Glendon Rusch. Rusch may be better suited for the craps table than Shea Stadium, however; the 24 year-old Seattle native surrendered seven runs on seven hits in seven innings during his most recent stint with KC (Both players involved in the trade have spent the majority of '99 in the minors.).

Baseball fans in general, and long-ball fans in particular, got a little scare when HR-king Mark McGwire left Monday's game against Milwaukee with a groin injury. The St. Louis slugger, who was not in the Cardinal lineup Tuesday and is being listed as day-to-day, apparently hurt himself while legging out a groundout in the fourth inning against the Brewers.

The NFL finally kicked off for real this weekend, and it looks like '99 will be another season to expect the unexpected. The consensus pre-season Super Bowl "locks", Tampa Bay and the Jets, employed Pop Warner-quality quarterbacking in losing efforts to the Giants and Pats, respectively. (Actually, Buc QB Trent Dilfer would probably ride even the Pop Warner pine after handing NY the ball on three interceptions and a fumble.)

Granted, the Jets can point to an absolute plague of injuries as an excuse for their performance. Quarterback Vinny Testaverde will miss the rest of '99 with a torn Achilles tendon; RB Leon Johnson ditto with torn knee ligaments. Add DT Jason Ferguson (sprained right ankle and knee) and WR Wayne Chrebet (broken foot), and Camp Parcells is looking like a miserable place to spend the season.

Vindication was the name of the game in Atlanta, as the visiting Vikings watched usually rock-steady Falcon kicker Morten Anderson shank not one but two field goal attempts from inside the 40 in a 17-14 Minnesota win. Last season, Atlanta won a trip to the Super Bowl courtesy of Viking kicker Gary Anderson's only miss of the year in the NFC title game.

Speaking of Minnesota, it appears that the book on stopping sensational sophomore receiver Randy Moss reads something like this: simply don't allow him a chance to catch the ball. The Falcons limited last year's Rookie of the Year to 24 yards on only three catches, basically by tackling Moss the instant he made his initial break toward the ball. Even costly pass interference calls on Cornerback Ray Buchanan (52 yards) and Safety Marty Carter (24 yards) did little to change this tactic.

The NFL may have lost two of its truly monumental figures this off-season with the retirement of John Elway and Barry Sanders, but it appears that their respective teams have the means to survive without them after all.

Pair of UMass athletes soar over weekend, take home top A-10 conference accolades

BRIAN MCDERMOTT/ COLLEGIAN

Adrian Zullo tied an Atlantic 10 Conference record by reeling in four touchdowns in the Minutemen's 34-19 victory over New Hampshire.

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The pressure was on Adrian Zullo. At just 5'7" and just 151 pounds, the sophomore wideout for the Massachusetts football team stared adversity in the eye and came through.

Quarterback Todd Bankhead hit a wide-open Zullo in the second quarter to open up the scoring. Then he found him again for hookup No. 2. Then for the hat trick. And finally for the record. Zullo, who had eight touchdown catches in all of last season, cut off his share of Atlantic 10 history by tying a conference record for receiving touchdowns in a game.

The Atlantic 10 recognized the Floridian by naming him the conference's Offensive Player of the Week. Zullo collected five catches for 92 yards in a 34-19 rout of New Hampshire, all of his scores coming from Bankhead."[He] scored a couple of them on the same route," head coach Mark Whipple said in the conference's weekly teleconference, "and on the second one he made just a great open-field run after the catch."

The most recent A-10 player to make four touchdown receptions was UMass' Jimmy Moore last season, accomplishing the feat against Connecticut last season. Ironically enough, Moore has caught on as a graduate assistant and as Zullo's main mentor in his acceptance of the leadership role.

"He's certainly shown that when he gets the ball in hands, he can get it in the end zone," Whipple said. "We think he's had a good start and he's got a really good chance to be a good player in this league."

Taking over the role as the team's foremost possession receiver on offense, Whipple took Zullo's 10.4 100-meter speed and used it to balance out an offense that shook up the UMass record books on every level. With Moore, tight end Kerry Taylor and fullback Matt Jordan, the team's three leading receivers last season having graduated, Zullo's role was upgraded.

Returning after an outstanding freshman campaign, good enough for the conference's newcomer of the year, Zullo will have to play a key role in the offensive scheme if the Minutemen are to book any flights to Chattanooga. UMass as a whole sputtered out of the gate, as the two teams traded zeros on the scoreboard. The offense was lackluster and the offense did not look like the unit that chalked up 55 points against Georgia Southern in last year's championship game. Finally, a minute and a half into the second quarter, the connection was made and Zullo's grand day begun and UNH's hopes of following up its first victory were all but dashed.

"In the first quarter, we were really trying to get him the ball," Whipple said. "He made the plays we think he's capable of making, that he has shown the ability to make in the last year."

"Never in my wildest dreams did I think I'd have four," Zullo said.

Zullo and the Minutemen take the field again this weekend when they head to Philadelphia to take on the Villanova Wildcats, who knocked off defending conference champion Richmond, 35-30, on Saturday.

As if a great weekend was not enough for the Massachusetts volleyball team to relish, going 3-1 in hosting the Motorola Invitational, the Atlantic 10 Conference has recognized the feats of the Minutewomen, honoring the leader of the pack, Kari Hogancamp. After hauling in the past week's WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week honors, the senior from Huntington Beach, Calif. was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week for her performance in victories over Seton Hall, New Hampshire and Southern Mississippi. The team finished second overall, falling to Michigan State in the final.

Hogancamp has been a bookend in her three years in a UMass uniform. Her steadiness was on display this weekend as the outside hitter recorded her 1000th career kill in the championship match with the Spartans. She became just the third player in team history to register both 1,000 kills and 1,000 digs in their career, joining standouts Lesley Nolan and Dionne Nash.

"This honor is even more special this week for Kari because our team was able to go 3-1 this past weekend in our tournament," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "All the individual attention is really nice, but what is really important is when those individual contributions help our team win."

Hogancamp joined fellow senior Jill Meyers on the All Tournament team, each tallying an average of four kills per game over the weekend. The former registered double-doubles in three of the four matches, including an 11-kill, 13-dig performance in the championship round.

Tabbed as a top 50 prospect coming out of high school by Volleyball Weekly, Hogancamp came to UMass and had an immediate impact on both the team and the conference. Since coming to UMass, Hogancamp has started every match, leading the conference in digs for three consecutive seasons.

The Minutewomen (3-4) rolled through the field before bumping heads with Michigan State. Through the first three matches, UMass opponents failed to claim a set. After disposing of the Pirates 15-4, 15-7, 15-12, the Minutewomen closed out Friday's action by taking out UNH in straight sets, 15-6, 15-12, 15-4.

UMass set the stage for a tough championship battle by sweeping the Golden Eagles of USM, 15-9, 15-13, 15-4. Unfortunately, the Spartans were too tough, taking home the Motorola trophy with a straight set victory.

Kenny and the Minutewomen next take the floor on Friday when they open up their conference schedule with home dates against Xavier and Dayton. A pair of wins would give Kenny 500 victories in 15 seasons with Tennessee and UMass. Starting time is set for 7 p.m. when UMass takes on the Musketeers.

Just a child in senior circuit, Arizona playing big in September stretch run

By Thomas Boswell
Washington Post

Last Friday in New York, Pedro Martinez of the Red Sox humiliated the Yankees hitters, holding the defending world champions to one hit with 17 strikeouts and no walks. The Yanks looked like they needed Serena Williams to return serve for them. Maybe she could have gotten a foul ball.

On Saturday, Yankee pitchers took their turn in the pillory, losing 11-10, thanks to nine walks. On Sunday, Roger Clemens lost again. The Rocket launch has been a scrub this season - 12-9, a 4.65 ERA.

Finally, on Monday, Toronto's David Wells, the Yankees' hero of last October, beat his old New York huddies, 2-1, for his 14th victory. That's two more than ringless Roger. Sure you bet on the right hoss, Boss?

After that fourth straight defeat, The Greatest Team Ever had the seventh best winning percentage in baseball this season.

Wake up and smell the hard ball, people!

With three weeks left in the regular season, the game's autumn fragrance has seldom been more pungent. This battle is absolutely wide open. Eight teams, maybe even nine if you include Boston, have a reasonable chance to go to the World Series.

We're not talking about far-fetched, if-everything-goes-right fantasy scenarios. Right now, eight teams have between 85 and 90 wins. Boston has 82. All of them have obvious strengths. And just as obvious weaknesses. These teams aren't merely vulnerable. They practically wobble as they come out for the anthem.

How hard is it to handicap this lovely mess? You want the Indians? Fine. You get their pitching staff, too. Cleveland's ERA is 18th in baseball. You want the Astros' 20-game winners, Mike Hampton and Jose Lima? Great. You get their offense, too, 16th in runs scored.

If you've got a mega-bullpen and sluggers to spare, like Texas, then your rotation reads like a rummage sale. How can you be so destitute that you give 25 starts to a guy with a 7.46 ERA, as Johnny Oates has Jeff Fassero?

Just when you think the doughty Mets, for example, might have enough of this and a sufficiency of that, plus a fabulous defense, you suddenly ask, "Who's their big winner?" Why, it's Chad Ogea's favorite cheater, Orel Hershiser, 41 years old this week. You could have had Orel last winter for a smile.

The Dodgers and Orioles with their astronomical budgets should be doubly ashamed these days. If the frugal Reds, rehuilt Mets, no-name Red Sox and expansion Diamondbacks are printing playoff tickets, what's their excuse? Maybe you can't buy a pennant so easily after all.

Baseball fans tend to form opinions and late-season prognostications based on statistics. For decades, a team that won 100 games was deemed excellent. That's not necessarily true now. Not in this era of impoverished have nots. Baseball has four teams that may lose 100 games and four others that are no darn good at all.

So, subtract a half-dozen wins from all the contenders to compen-

After disposing of the Pirates 15-4, 15-7, 15-12, the Minutewomen closed out Friday's action by taking out UNH in straight sets, 15-6, 15-12, 15-4.

UMass set the stage for a tough championship battle by sweeping the Golden Eagles of USM, 15-9, 15-13, 15-4. Unfortunately, the Spartans were too tough, taking home the Motorola trophy with a straight set victory.

Kenny and the Minutewomen next take the floor on Friday when they open up their conference schedule with home dates against Xavier and Dayton. A pair of wins would give Kenny 300 victories in 15 seasons with Tennessee and UMass. Starting time is set for 7 p.m. when UMass takes on the Musketeers.

Just a child in senior circuit, Arizona playing big in September stretch run

By Thomas Boswell
Washington Post

Last Friday in New York, Pedro Martinez of the Red Sox humiliated the Yankees hitters, bulding the defending world champions to one hit with 17 strikeouts and no walks. The Yanks looked like they needed Serena Williams to return serve for them. Maybe she could have gotten a foul ball.

On Saturday, Yankee pitchers took their turn in the pillory, losing 11-10, thanks to nine walks. On Sunday, Roger Clemens lost again. The Rocket launch has been a scrub this season – 12-9, a 4.65 ERA.

Finally, on Monday, Toronto's David Wells, the Yankees' hero of last October, beat his old New York buddies, 2-1, for his 14th victory. That's two more than ringless Roger. Sure you bet on the right hoss, Boss?

After that fourth straight defeat. The Greatest Team Ever had the seventh best winning percentage in baseball this season.

Wake up and smell the hard hall, people!

With three weeks left in the regular season, the game's autumn fragrance has seldom been more pungent. This battle is absolutely wide open. Eight teams, maybe even nine if you include Boston, have a reasonable chance to go to the World Series.

We're not talking about far-fetched, if-everything-goes-right fantasy scenarios. Right now, eight teams have between 85 and 90 wins. Boston has 82. All of them have obvious strengths. And just as obvious weaknesses. These teams aren't merely vulnerable. They practically wobble as they come out for the anthem.

How hard is it to handicap this lovely mess? You want the Indians? Fine. You get their pitching staff, too. Cleveland's ERA is 18th in baseball. You want the Astros' 20-game winners, Mike Hampton and Jose Lima? Great. You get their offense, too, 16th in runs scored.

If you've got a mega-bullpen and sluggers to spare, like Texas, then your rotation reads like a rummage sale. How can you be so destitute that you give 25 starts to a guy with a 7.46 ERA, as Johnny Oates has Jeff Fassero?

Just when you think the doughty Mets, for example, might have enough of this and a sufficiency of that, plus a fabulous defense, you suddenly ask, "Who's their big winner?" Why, it's Chad Ogea's favorite cheater, Orel Hershiser, 41 years old this week. You could have had Orel last winter for a smile.

The Dodgers and Orioles with their astronomical budgets should be doubly ashamed these days. If the frugal Reds, rebuilt Mets, no-name Red Sox and expansion Diamondbacks are printing playoff tickets, what's their excuse? Maybe you can't buy a pennant so easily after all.

Baseball fans tend to form opinions and late-season prognostications based on statistics. For decades, a team that won 100 games was deemed excellent. That's not necessarily true now. Not in this era of impoverished have nots. Baseball has four teams that may lose 100 games and four others that are no darn good at all.

So, subtract a half-dozen wins from all the contenders to compen-

SGA Elections Loom Large

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Nominations opened yesterday for Senate seats in the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association, and this year's election will include two heavily debated referendum questions.

Students seeking at-large senator positions must receive 25 signatures from their respective residential area, while those running for residential senate seats must receive signatures from within their residential dorm.

Nominations will close on Wednesday, Sept. 22,at 5pm.

The Senate seats have been broken down according to living areas and the number of seats available has been determined based on the number of students living in each area.

Jeremy Rouille, Chancellor of Elections, said the SGA needs a 5% voter turnout for the election results to be valid. The last time that the elections were determined invalid was two years ago, when there was less than the 5% requirement. Rouille's goal is to prevent this from happening again.

This year, Rouille said, the elections will be different from years past. Because of the housing shortage, leaving students living in lounges and "swing spaces," it is difficult to determine in which residential areas these students should be included.

For now, Rouille said any student living in any kind of temporary housing will be termed "off-campus" in regards to the elections. However, Rouille is hesitant to determine how many off-campus seats should be represented since Housing Services hasn't reached a solution.

"There's people living in lounges and we don't know where they're going to go, so we're counting them as off-campus students for now," Rouille said. "Some people off campus are even there because of the housing crunch and we [SGA] haven't seen the numbers."

Despite the situation, Rouille is still hopeful for the upcoming election and is hoping there will be a large student turnout at the voting booths.

"It's only a one day election," Rouille said. "This is why it is extremely important to get the 5%. It's what the Constitution tells us to do, so we have one day to do it."

Junior journalism major Jim Eltringham said his concern for the election surrounds the Northeast, Central and Southwest House Council elections that are taking place two days before the Senate elections. He said many students might not be aware of the two separate elections.

"If you don't eat, sleep and breathe SGA, you many not realize that there are two separate elections going on," Eltringham said. "Students should definitely be involved in both, but it's not hard to be under the misconception that only one is going on."

The House Council elections will be held on Tuesday and Wednesday, Sept. 28 and 29 in an area-specified location. The SGA Senate elections will take place on Thursday, Sept. 30 in the Dining Commons.

In addition to electing Senators, students will have the opportunity to vote on two Student Government referendum questions. One referendum question focuses on

Hurricane Floyd Wreaks Havoc in Southeast

By Sue Anne Pressley and Guy Gugliotta
Washington Post

CHARLESTON, S.C. – Hurricane Floyd battered the southeastern U.S. coast yesterday, causing wide-spread flooding, power outages and evacuations as it raced toward the fragile shores of North and South Carolina.

Residents along this storm-weary region disappeared into shelter as forecasters warned of tremendous storm surges that could topple homes into the sea. 115 mph winds that could lift tall oaks from the ground and fling them onto rooftops, and 5 to 10 inches of rain that could send vehicles swirling into rivers.

"Never in my wildest dreams did I think I'd have four," Zullo said.

An estimated 800,000 residents of coastal South Carolina and 300,000 Georgia residents joined 1.7 million Floridians who were under evacuation orders. While Florida avoided the brunt of the storm, governors in the Carolinas, Georgia and Virginia declared states of emergency and alerted National Guard troops. Air and train travel were interrupted all over the Southeast, and interstates in Florida, Georgia and South Carolina were clogged with thousands of panicked residents who had decided this was one storm they had better not ride out.

At least Floyd was not quite the behemoth it had been as it ravaged the Bahamas on Tuesday, leaving one person dead and reports of severe damage and raked large stretches of the Florida coast.

At its most powerful, the storm packed 155 mph winds, making it a borderline Category 5 storm, the deadliest of all. Although it had lost some of its force by yesterday night, it remained a moderately strong Category 3 on the Saffir-Simpson scale of 1 to 5 and forecasters warned that no one in its path could afford to take it lightly.

By late yesterday afternoon, conditions were obviously deteriorating in the Charleston area, where windtossed rain skitted across parking lots, and in Myrtle Beach, which resembled a ghost town as residents apparently heeded repeated warnings about the storm's potential. Emergency officials enacted a 3 p.m. curfew, allowing no one else to enter or leave the area. In tiny Wrightsville Beach, N.C., residents were battened down for their fifth hurricane since 1996.

Rain was blowing sideways across Charleston harbor, where a couple of small yachts were riding uneasily at buoys. Trees along the city's shady colonial avenues bounded and bent, and copper roofs quivered in winds that were gusting past 50 miles per hour.

At Folly Beach State Park on the Atlantic south of central Charleston, 10- to 12-foot waves engulfed piers and sent foam-rolled surf above breakwaters and into the yards of tony seaside condominiums. Bridges were closed and emergency personnel abandoned high-risk areas shortly after noon, leaving the few remaining residents to fend for themselves.

Public transportation stopped at 9 a.m. Most of the few remaining open restaurants and food stores closed their doors at mid-morning. Businesses boarded up their windows and gas stations turned off their pumps. Hardware stores sold their final flashlights, then locked their doors.

By mid-afternoon, twisting windstore tree branches loose and flung them into suburban streets north of Charleston. Sheet metal facing on a Chinese restaurant facade was ripped away. Winds peeled up the edges of metal roofs overhanging gas stations. Traffic lights swayed in the wind, and the first power outages were reported. Cars virtually disappeared from the streets by middas as residents moved inland or entered some 100 shelters around the state.

Despite the ultimate success of the evacuation, there were recriminations about the massive traffic jams that developed as thousands of Charlestonians mobbed highways leading to Columbia. A trip that ordinarily takes two hours on Tuesday left thousands of motorists stuck on the road for as long as 16 hours.

A number of low-country Carolinians decided to ride out the storm. At the Substation II deli in North Charleston, a cheerful staff made lunch sandwiches for grateful motorists trapped on the highway with nowhere to buy a meal. At the Daybreak Inn, short order cooks made breakfast before closing their doors.

A few miles away at the River Bend Bar and Grill, a handful of hardcases drank beer and reminisced about Hugo and other great storms they had known. "You get used to it," said Bryan Tucker, who hurricane-proofs houses for a living. "My roof was hit by a tree during Hugo, but now, of course, the roof's gone, so there's no problem."

By 6 p.m., an estimated 100,000 people in South Carolina were without power.

But some good news began to emerge as Floyd departed Florida. The space shuttle fleet and Walt Disney World emerged largely untouched. The amusement park, which shut down Tuesday for the first time in its 28-year history, reopened at noon yesterday for limited business.

At NASA's Kennedy Space Center near Titusville, Fla., officials were relieved that they avoided a multibillion-dollar disaster that could have occurred had the storm veered closer. "We're losing the ground and blowing down to the east," said space center spokesman George Diller, who was among a contingent of 102 people who waited out the hurricane with the four space shuttles – which would cost an estimated $2 billion apiece to replace.

Professor Eqbal Ahmad Remembered at Hampshire

By Jason Spears
Collegian Correspondent

Beginning a week of reflection on the Eqbal Ahmad legacy, a photo exhibit of Ahmad, a professor at Hampshire College for 16 years who died this past spring, was unveiled this Tuesday.

Photographs and quotations spread over two walls retold Ahmad's life. Recordings of his speeches were also played.

The photographs begin with a portrait of Ahmad's mother, who gave birth to him in 1932 or 1933 in Bihar, India. She was a passionate anti-colonial nationalist, who once shared a prison courtyard space with Mahatama Ghandi. The photographs progress to show Ahmad as a young boy who would travel with Ghandi one summer, then later make the journey to Pakistan after the partition of India in 1948. His journey was retraced in the BBC documentary "Stories My Country Told Me," which will be screened tonight at 7 p.m. in Franklin Patterson Main Lecture Hall at Hampshire.

The next set of portraits shows Ahmad as a young man. At sixteen, he went to Kashmir to fight for Kashmiri independence. Ahmad eventually pursued graduate studies at Princeton University. While working on his doctorate in Algeria in the 1950s, he became deeply involved in the Algerian revolution, editing the Front National de Liberation newspaper with his friend Franz Fanon. After Algeria gained its independence, Ahmad consulted and conducted research for the script of the film The Battle of Algiers, which was screened last night at Franklin Patterson, Main Lecture Hall at Hampshire.

The photographs from the 1960s and 1970s show an Ahmad who became involved in the Palestinian struggle and was "the most articulate, most compelling speaker against the Vietnam war," according to Hampshire professor Carollee Bengelsdorf. Ahmad's views led to his isolation and ostracism in United States universities, and his indictment as part of the Harrisburg 7, a group put on trial for conspiracy to kidnap Henry Kissinger. The group is featured with him in the next series of photographs.

Militia leave East Timor

By David Lamb and Sonni Efron
Los Angeles Times

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Hundreds of anti-independence militiamen were pulling out of East Timor on Wednesday in the wake of the U.N. decision to send an international peacekeeping force into the violence-torn territory.

"It's too early to say for sure this is an evacuation, but there is a lot of troop movement going on, all in the direction of West Timor," said a senior U.N. official referring to the neighboring Indonesian province.

U.N. officials were encouraged, both by signs that militia members are withdrawing and by the cooperation shown by the Indonesian army, two elements that will be essential if the Australian-led force is to carry out its peacekeeping rather than peacemaking duties.

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said the initial deployment of the international force could take place as early as this weekend, with troops from other nations joining the Australians. Indonesia still has more than 25,000 troops and police officers on duty in the territory.

"We are under no illusion that this is a dangerous mission," Downer said.

Cancio Carvalho, commander of an anti-independence militia known as the Integration Fighting Force, told reporters in West Timor yesterday that his gunmen would not "create any problems" for the peacekeepers as long as the international force maintains neutrality. Carvalho and other militia leaders say U.N. personnel who organized the Aug. 30 referendum on East Timor's future were biased in favor of independence supporters.

Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Abdullah Alatas, in New York to negotiate terms of the deployment, also said neutrality was essential to the success of the mission. He said the U.N. authorized force will be in command of the situation on the ground, with Indonesian troops playing an advisory and liaison role.

East Timor, a former Portuguese colony invaded by Indonesia in 1975 and annexed the following year, has been torn by militia violence since nearly 80 percent of registered voters opted to end their forced association with Indonesia. The death toll from the rampage has reach into the thousands. Aid workers say that 200,000

Anonymity Hurts Gore

By Howard Kurtz
Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Americans are paying so little attention to the early skirmishing of the 2000 campaign that half could not name a Democratic candidate for president, according to a poll released yesterday.

The stunning finding in the Pew Research Center suggests that Vice President Al Gore, the depth leader of the free world, has failed to penetrate the fuzzy screen of a huge mass of potential voters. By contrast, 37 percent of those questioned failed to name a Republican presidential candidate. Even more remarkable, the blank looks came after respondents were asked a question about Gore and George W. Bush.

Has half the country taken a nap, or are Americans just focused on matters that seem more relevant than a pack of campaigning politicians?

"People are more disengaged now than in the past because we've had an extra year of the horse race," said Andrew Kohut, the center's director. "Impeachment and the Lewinsky scandal were about Washington politics and who's going to stay in power. So it's doubly difficult to get people to pay attention to the race. There's probably a little bit of backlash."

On the who-stunning question, 54 percent identified Texas Gov. Bush as a White House contender. 46 percent recalled Gore and 16 percent named Elizabeth Dole or Bill Bradley.

Gore spokesman Chris Lehane gamely put the best face on the findings, saying that "this entire campaign is going to be about introducing the vice president as a candidate for president to the American people" (for the record, the Gore camp spent nearly $9 million toward that end through June 30).

The poll of 1,205 adults signals increasing resentment of the way the media scrutinize the candidates, especially on personal matters. The Pew survey, conducted Sept. 1-12, followed a period of intense press coverage of questions about whether Bush used cocaine as a young man. The margin of error is plus or minus 5 percent.

At one end of the scale, more than 7 in 10 of those questioned say the press should report if a candidate has physically abused a spouse. Nearly two-thirds say a candidate's failure to pay income taxes should be reported. And more than 6 in 10 say journalists should pursue snooping about one's academic or military record.

But only 23 percent say past marital infidelity should almost always be reported, while 21 percent say it should sometimes be reported. Candidates who are still fooling around get less of a pass: Nearly two-thirds of those polled say journalists should disclose if a candidate is having an affair during the campaign.

UM Professor Debunks Affluence Myths

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Lee Badgett, an assistant professor of Economics at the University of Massachusetts, is considered one of the nation's leading experts on economic discrimination against gays and lesbians. For her work, she was cited by The Advocate, a prominent gay newsmagazine, as one of the 200 "best and brightest" gay activists in the country.

Yet her research might never have conducted had it not been for a single newspaper article.

"I was reading the Wall Street Journal one day," she said, "and I saw an article that called gays and lesbians 'a dream market.' It said that gay and lesbians have high incomes, and that they're huge consumers who are frequent fliers and take vacations to Europe. That struck me as being odd. Normally, when groups are discriminated against, they generally earn less."

Badgett, a longtime advocate for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (GLBT) causes, soon learned that the concept of gay affluence was crucial to the national movement for gay rights.

She cited a 1992 incident in Colorado, in which proponents of a statewide measure to curb gay employment rights sent out fliers asking, "Are gays a minority? You decide". The fliers cited high salaries for gays, and compared them to low incomes for racial minorities.

The law was approved by voters, but later struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court. Justice Antonin Scalia, writing the minority opinion, stated that homosexuals did not need civil rights protection because they are wealthy, and thus have influence over the political process.

Upon realizing the political importance of the issue, Badgett became determined to find the truth behind the "gay wealth" stereotype.

"I felt like a detective," she said. "There's not really a lot of good data on gay people."

Eventually, though, she came across a study showing that homosexual men earned less on average than heterosexual men.

Upon amassing countless studies and surveys, Badgett was able to conclude a "real pattern of inequality for gay people."

The publishing of her findings brought her national attention, and helped to dispel the myth that homosexuals are free from economic discrimination

KARA STOKES/ COLLEGIAN

Lee Badgett, associate professor of Economics, is the leading researcher on employment discrimination.

Now, Badgett is in the process of finishing the manuscript for a book, which she says will look at "overt discrimination against gay people, employment discrimination and the issue of coming out at the workplace."

She is also working on the development of a research think tank, which, she hopes, "will put some credible information before the American public and political leaders about how to deal with gay and lesbian issues."

Badgett has been active in on-campus issues as well. In addition to teaching classes in microeconomics and labor economics, she has been a proponent for the creation of a University program dealing with human sexuality and GLBT issues, and serves on the Chancellor's Task Force for GLBT studies. She will be teaching a class next semester concerning the political economy of sexuality.

"I think it's very important that we have a campus where students can all sit down and discuss issues that we feel very strongly about," she said. "We need a greater intellectual community."

As for her "best and brightest" designation by The Advocate, Badgett said, "I was honored. It's not often that I get to be in the company of Barbra Streisand and Elton John."

Antibiotics fail; Bacteria Strengthens

By Bryn Nelson
Newsday

In the wake of last month's troubling report about an emerging antibiotic-resistant bacterial strain, researchers say it is time for the world to re-evaluate antibiotics overuse.

"The bugs are making such inroads in overcoming antibiotics and coupled with the slowdown in the pipeline of new drugs being produced it's a double whammy in terms of bad news," said Jim Naimi, a Minnesota-based epidemiologist with the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

"Our basic strategy of waiting for the next antibiotic to come around the corner is not a very sound one," he said. "What we need is appropriate use of the antibiotics that we do have."

As antibiotics such as penicillin become increasingly widespread scores of bugs are developing new strategies for win the struggle between life and death — and more humans are losing.

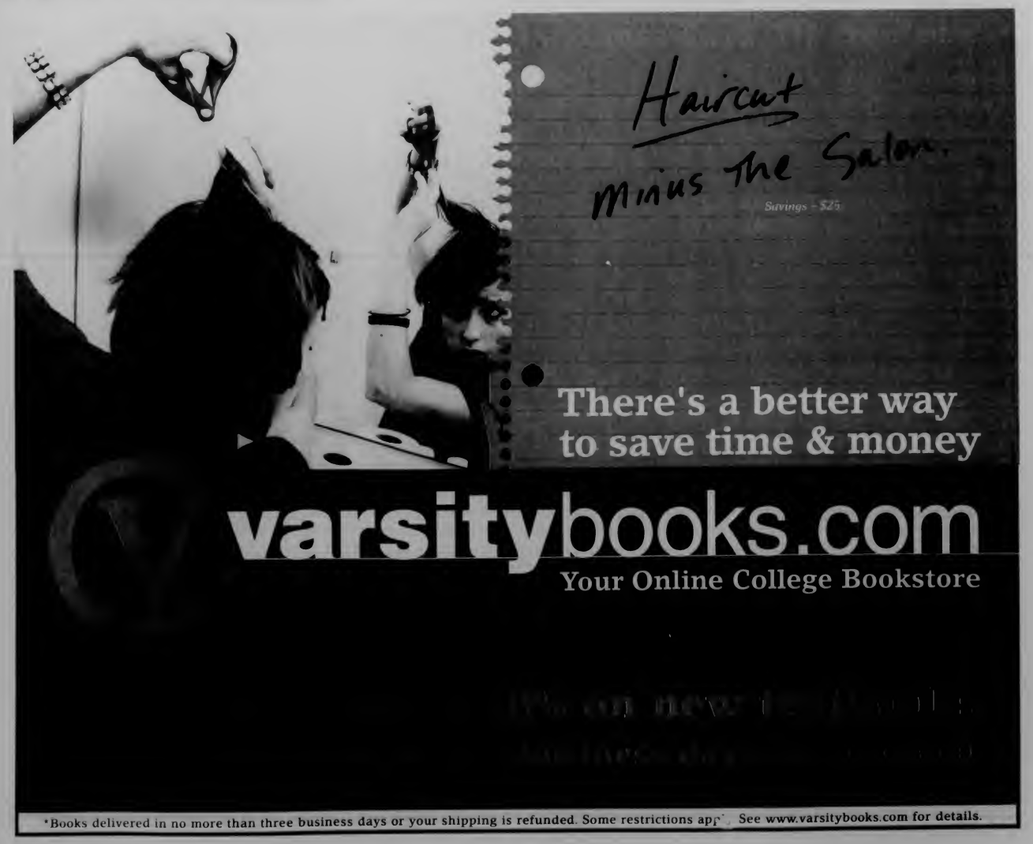
In a CDC report released last month, Naimi and researchers from the Minnesota and North Dakota state health departments and the Indian Health Service confirmed that four children succumbed to a bacterial infection caused by methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus, also known as MRSA. Until recently, this type of bacterial infection had been confined to hospitals and nursing homes, where drug-resistant bugs have frequently gained the upper hand in susceptible patients such as the elderly and burn victims.

But the CDC's report documents the first recorded deaths in the United States attributed to true community-acquired MRSA infections. All of the children had been previously healthy and had no known connections to hospitals or nursing homes.

Stuart Levy, director of the Center for Adaptation Genetics and Drug Research at Tufts University, called the report "frightening and alarming."

"It is a disease that is killing people who should not be dying," he said.

Within the past decade, infections have surfaced in other countries including Australia, New Zealand and Canada. Two previous reports had documented similar infections among children in inner-city Chicago and in two day-care centers in Kentucky.



In the latest study, the four racially diverse victims lived in different communities in North Dakota and Minnesota. Researchers also blamed the bacterial infections for sickening more than 200 people — mostly children and young adults — in the two states over the past three years. Naimi said these observations suggest the strain, while not necessarily common, is widespread in that region.

Normally a harmless bacteria found in the nostrils and on the skin of up to 60 percent of healthy individuals, Staphylococcus aureus can pose a danger if it enters the body through a cut or scrape. The microbe travels through the blood and attacks vital organs.

Clinton Addresses Globe

By Edwin Chen
Los Angeles Times

CHRISTCHURCH, New Zealand – President Clinton called yesterday for a new commitment to halt global warming, saying that unless humans reduce emissions of gases that cause temperatures to rise, the melting of polar ice caps will produce catastrophic consequences around the world.

Clinton made his remarks near the conclusion of his state visit to this environmentally aware South Pacific island nation.

After an official dinner hosted by New Zealand Prime Minister Jenny Shipley, the president rushed back to Washington late yesterday to supervise the federal response to Hurricane Floyd.

"We've done everything we know to do," Clinton told reporters here yesterday after consulting with Vice President Al Gore and James Lee Witt, head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, about the storm threatening the U.S. East Coast.

In his environmental address, Clinton painted a dire picture of the consequences of global warming.

"Unless we change course, most scientists believe the seas will rise so high they will swallow whole islands and coastal areas. Storms, like hurricanes, and droughts, both will intensify," he said. "Diseases like malaria will be borne by mosquitoes at higher and higher altitudes and across borders, threatening more lives – a phenomenon we already see today in Africa."

Clinton said the chief obstacle to reform is not "the huge array of wealthy vested interests and the tens of thousands of ordinary people around the world who work in the oil and the coal industries," but the outdated notion that energy consumption is a barometer of wealth.

"The largest obstacle is the continued clinging of people in wealthy countries and developing countries to 'a big idea' that is no longer true – the idea that the only way a country can become wealthy and remain wealthy is to have the patterns of energy use that brought us the Industrial Age."

As for a candidate having used cocaine as a young adult, 33 percent say it should almost always be reported, while 40 percent say such stories should almost never be reported.

"People just don't want to hear about the private lives of politicians unless it's really horrific," Kohut said.

An interesting partisan split emerged on the question of what is newsworthy. Fifty-seven percent of Republicans, perhaps reminded of President Clinton and Monica Lewinsky, say news organizations should almost always report if a candidate is having an affair during the campaign. Only 3 in 10 Democrats agree.

But, while Republicans are tougher than Democrats on most of these hypothetical scandals, the difference evaporates on past cocaine use, which people likely associate with Bush. On that issue, 36 percent of Republicans and 33 percent of Democrats say the coke question is highly newsworthy.

All told, 64 percent say that news organizations have too much influence over the campaign.

As for the horse race, Bradley has narrowed the gap by 10 points since July, but Gore still leads his Democratic rival, 58 percent to 32 percent. Bush leads the vice president in a general-election match up, 54 percent to 39 percent. If Pat Buchanan is added as a Reform Party candidate, Bush wins 49-35, with 10 percent for Buchanan.

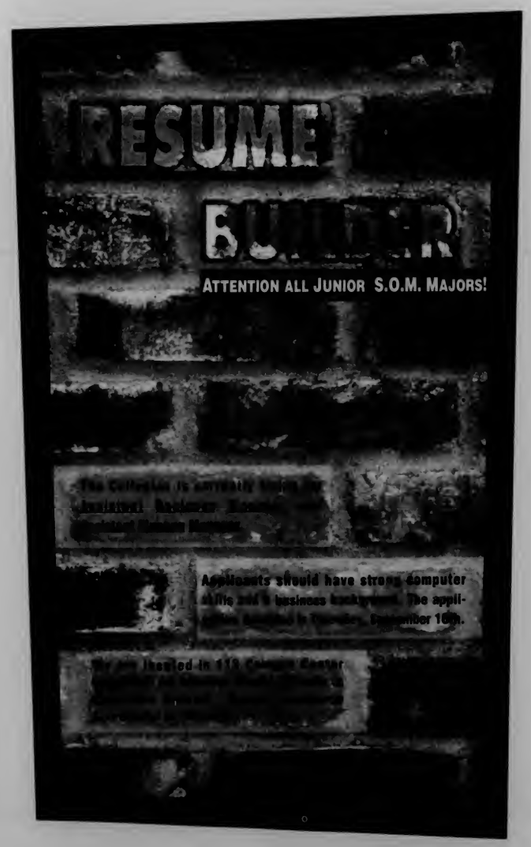
people – or one-fourth of the territory's East Timorese – are now refugees.



Thousands of the refugees have sought safety from the marauding militias in East Timor's mile-high mountains. Australia hoped to begin an airlift of food and emergency supplies to them today.

An aid worker in Kupang, the capital of West Timor, confirmed that truckloads of refugees, some escorted by armed guards, have been pouring across the border into the province. Others are arriving by boat and plane. An estimated 125,000 refugees are camped out in stadiums, tent cities and schools. There are shortages of water and latrines.

About 65,000 refugees have arrived in Atambua, a town of 12,000 people about seven miles from the border with East Timor, said Sanjay Sojwal of the relief agency World Vision in a telephone interview.

Many of the militia members who terrorized the neighboring territory have moved to West Timor and taken control of refugee camps. They have stopped journalists from entering the camps, threatened and stoned foreign aide workers and kept visitors hostage in their hotels in Kupang.

DON'T MISS OUT ON THIS EXCELLENT OPPORTUNITY!!!

Editorial/Opinion

Clubs, Clubs everywhere!

On this campus, there are an awful lot of clubs – so many that our fair university has gone so far as to dedicate a small part of its web page to listing every single one of them. It also provides links to the web pages of those clubs (see http://www.umass.edu/campact/list.html for this most fun list). UMass even goes so far as to provide a short description of most clubs.

However, these clubs seem to represent just one side of the spectrum. To really encourage some dialogue between people of different viewpoints, to really see to it that all sides are represented, some students need to get to work creating clubs that represent the opposing views to current clubs.

The Animal Rights Coalition (ARC) for example. Over there in the Student Union, they have painted their windows with pro-animal slogans and on the web page, according to UMass, the ARC's purpose is, and I quote, "to focus on a campaign to free animals from exploitation and suffering and work towards an environmentally sound ecosystem for both human and non-human animals. To increase awareness of the needless suffering of animals."

A great cause, no doubt, but where on this campus is the Meat Eaters/Subjugation of Animals Club (ME/SAC)? One would think that with all the meat people consume, someone would have created a club to celebrate such a thing. Fact is, I can't think of anything more appetizing as I sit in the Collegian's cold office than a warm hunk of dead cow, perhaps with some mushrooms, pepper, and maybe a dash of A-1.

That would be scrumptious, and more to the point, such a club would foster an important dialogue between meat eaters and non-meat eaters. Think of the possibilities as the ME/SAC invites ARC over for dinner. A pleasant discussion about the subjugation and consumption of animals could be had over plates of pork chops and bowls of tofu. And think of the positions on hunting! The ME/SAC side could argue that there are plenty of people who hunt because they need food, and it's cheaper, while the ARC could rally against the whole issue. This kind of give and take would do the campus well, as it would spread word about both sides of the issue.

> "Lazy students of the world, unite! It's about time this campus got LSC, the Lazy Students Club..."
> Sam Wilkinson

On the website could be ME/SAC's little description: "The purpose of this club is to acknowledge that a whole lot of people love to eat ribs, steaks, burgers, pork chops and other various forms of succulent meat, and the fact that these animals must be caged in and eventually slaughtered to fulfill the needs of a hungry meat-eating populace, is an unfortunate, but totally necessary (and fine with us) thing."

But the new clubs on this campus wouldn't have to stop there.

Certainly not, considering the existence of Friends of RAH, a group described on the website to promote "and expand revolutionary anti-imperialist politics on campus and among the campus community."

What an important goal. This is a club with lofty goals, and the fact is, they are doing good things on the campus, but they're doing them without opposition, without anyone to really get them fired up. A political group is made all the better by an opposing political group. Look at the Democrats. Would they be so good without the Republicans nagging at them? Of course not.

Hence this campus needs, without question, SQGAISIP, the Status Quo Government Association In Support of Imperialist Policy. This group would get together every so often to discuss ways in which the University is doing its job in keeping innocent people down, which can include anything from the total stifling of free speech to the complete crumbling of student rights, to the total lack of prisoner rights. They could even go with the Police Department, or maybe another organization that RAH can't stand, just to provide a student-led force that could only be described as "backup."

While the Friends of RAH have a black fist as their symbol, SQGAISIP could have a jackboot, or maybe an artist's rendition of Big Brother.

On the Website, SQGAISIP could be described in the following way: "The purpose of this group is to revel in the fact that while we sit as free men in support of the system, the University is going out of its way to keep everyone else down which, because we're helping keep everyone down, is fine with us."

That would be sure to fire up RAH, which could then take a more radical stance, and a cycle would be started that would surely benefit everyone involved.

And what about the Golden Key National Honor Society (GKNHS), whose purpose is described on the web page as: "to recognize and encourage scholastic achievement and excellence in all undergraduate fields of study. To provide recognition to students who are superior academically, without requiring individual participation of members."

Who is their opposition?

Lazy students of the world, unite! It's about time this campus got LSC, the Lazy Students Club, recognizing students who, rather than really busting their butts on their schoolwork, take it easy. Maybe for some people, getting a C in their Dutch class is a fairly big accomplishment (considering they studied twice a week for 15 minutes at a time) and yet for some reason, no club on this campus chooses to recognize such a complete lack of effort.

LSC could show up at GKNHS meetings and disrupt them, shouting out things like "nerd" or "dork" whenever someone was recognized as someone who was, to quote the website again, "superior academically." And likewise, GKNHS members would be encouraged to attend LSC's annual meetings to shout things out like, "Where are your other meetings?" and "Are you too lazy to have them?" and "Slacker!"

An exchange like that would do this campus good, and would serve to open the door to students of all kinds of different backgrounds, be them hard working, or slack-ass lazy.

There are other clubs too: the WASP (White Anglo-Saxon Protestant) club, recognizing the continuing contributions of WASPs worldwide, TSA (The Straight Alliance) recognizing the fun that can be had when a woman and a man engage in sex, and of course, TSC-GO-A (The Student Co-op Grill Out Association) who, while being in ways like ME/SAC, would provide students, in a co-op atmosphere, lots and lots of meat, rather than any silly vegetarian foods, made by students, for students.

The fact of the matter is that this is only the tip of the proverbial iceberg. We have a bevy of possible clubs on this campus that have yet to be established. Therefore UMass students, for the sake of free speech (with the exception of SQGAISIP) should rally to create such clubs, to further open up the already gaping exchange of ideas that exists on this campus.

Attention, victims of the housing office

If you are one of those kids who have been screwed over by housing and are living in the hotel or in a lounge, you can quit your bitching because I have found the solution. If you are living comfortably in a dorm room or off campus, but one of your friends has been tossed aside by this careless university, tell them to read this column and I will lead them to the promised land. I have the inside tip on a place where the vacancy light is always on. I have some info on a place where they will not only have cable, but the television will be mounted high on the wall so they can finally lay back and relax.

In this utopia that I have discovered you will have no worries. Your food will be made for you, your laundry will be done for you, and you don't even have to get out of bed to go to the bathroom. I'm sure that you're skeptical, but believe me this place exists. It is right near the Amherst/Hadley border, across the street from the new Big Y. This wonderful place that makes dreams come true is called the Amherst Center For Extended Care.

Dan Viens

Yes, I am speaking of a nursing home. But please, do not dismiss this idea yet. There are many positives to living in one of these centers as a college student. As far as I can see there is only one negative aspect to living in a nursing home, and it really doesn't even have to do with living there. The only negative aspect to living in the Center for Extended Care is that it might be kind of tough to convince their professional staff that a college-aged kid is actually elderly, and in need of care. However, I have thought this through entirely and have come up with a very feasible solution.

The first step is makeup. Luckily I was in a theater production here last semester and I have a small makeup kit. One of the characters in the play was an old woman and the actress who played her was only twenty. I closely observed the techniques they used to make her skin look wrinkly and old. Once I strategically place a few black lines around your face, you'll look and feel fifty years older.

The next step is identification and insurance. As far as the identification goes we can just take your license and make it say that you were born in the twenties or thirties instead of the seventies or eighties. As far as your picture on the ID, don't worry about that. They'll just think that you were delirious and switched your picture with your grandson's or granddaughter's.

Now for the insurance card. There are enough kids around that make fake IDs who probably wouldn't have a hard time making a fake Blue Cross & Blue Shield card. However, if there is a big problem then I'm sure we can just go on the Internet and find one.

Now that your face looks old and you have all the identification to prove that you're old, all you'll need are some pants and a sweater from the Salvation Army and you'll be ready to roll up to the Center for Extended Care. Before you get out of my friend Evan's van there will be a few last minute essentials that we'll have to go over. The first will have to be your drool effect. A nurse will be able to spot a counterfeit drool from a mile away. So you're going to have to be convincing. You can't be afraid to get drool on your clothes or to leave it on your chin until somebody else wipes it off for you. The next trait that you will have to get down is your hobble. As soon as you exit the van you're on your own and you'll have to hobble all the way up to the front entrance. As you reach this entrance it is important that you fall and pretend to smack your head on the door.

The finishing touches on your entrance will be the razor blade in your left hand, which you'll use to cut your forehead (like a professional wrestler), and the insurance card in your right hand which you'll have outstretched as the orderlies come to get you. Once they see that sweet insurance coverage in your hand, they won't think twice about giving you a bed in the greatest dorm ever.

The perks of living in the Center for Extended Care will start right on the first day. They'll figure that you either don't have any family or they don't care about you (because of the way you came to them) so they'll probably start you off with a nice, sensual sponge bath. Hopefully it will be given by a nice, attractive nurse of the opposite or same sex, whichever you prefer. On the first day I recommend that you take a personal day to really enjoy your new digs. First things first: get used to that high tech, comfy, adjustable bed. Just have a nice day of applesauce and daytime television. Maybe one pillow isn't enough; just call the nurse and ask for another. If two isn't enough, then tell them to bring another. Maybe your calves are a little tender from waiting in line at Whitmore; have them bring you a couple of hot water bottles to ease your discomfort.

Now that you have a steady place to live, you're going to have to start getting your act together. This means you've got to start attending class regularly, eating better and getting your social life together. As far as getting to class and back is concerned, it will be a little tricky to get in and out each day, but it can be done. You'll have to wait until they take a group of you out into the courtyard for some fresh air. As soon as no one is looking, knock one of the other patients out of their wheelchair. Then make up some lie to tell the nurse. They will be very happy for your help. As the nurses are helping your victim up, you can make a run for it and get to a couple of classes before they even know you're gone. If they do realize that you're missing, they will be so happy to see you when you get back that you'll probably get extra applesauce.

Speaking of applesauce, eating is very important. By this point you will probably be malnourished because of all the moving around that you have been doing, so it will be very important to get all of your vitamins and minerals. However, don't think that you're going to have to cook your own food or even go to a cafeteria to eat. No, no: you can get any food you want in milk-shake form. If you want to have an entire Thanksgiving dinner in five minutes that isn't anything a blender can't handle. Also, if you don't like your dinner don't worry, because no matter what, there is always Jell-O or pudding for dessert.

Once you are well relaxed and fully nourished, you will be able to work on becoming friends with your roommates and dorm-mates. There is no trick to this whatsoever. A lot of the people in the Amherst Center for Extended Care either don't have family to visit them or don't recognize them when they come. All you'll have to do is take up a severe interest in Frank Sinatra, knee socks, the good old days, and anything to do with dentures, and you're in.

There you go. That's all there is to getting on the modern version of the Underground Railroad. Only this one isn't away from oppressing slave owners, it is to the comfortable housing that we all deserve.

I'm speechless

I found myself relating to Britney Spears for the first time in my life last week. No, I didn't get a breast augmentation or find my latest Rolling Stone baby-doll shout on my gas friends' walls. Much to my surprise, they don't make such adolescent lingerie for my 5'10" frame.

Kathleen Ralls

Instead, I lost my voice like most singers do at some point in their career. You have to assume that Axl Rose abused a few throat chords in his day.

My reason sounds a little less exciting. You see, I have been coaching a local high school field hockey team and right at the start of the first game, my voice just disappeared. Well, not fully. I sounded like one of those endearing contestants on Star Search through the first half, belting out corner calls and substitutions to the best of my ability. But by the second half, I was forced to count on my bench to relay my coaching expertise. Fortunately, my talented team was able to pull through without my expertise to remain undefeated.

Unbeknownst to me at the time, the real challenge would come at night, when I was heading uptown with my friends. It was then that I understood what it is to be a diva minus her medium (although I wouldn't want you to think I am actually claiming to be a diva). Believe it or not, that is where Britney and I vary a little bit.

And contrary to popular myths, not every single UMass student drinks. We're a small but proud minority, either opt to stay in for four years and be miserable, or go out and make people think we are drunk.

In any case, after much squeaking about how well the 'Canes did before we entered the bar (out shot the other squad 29 to zip, baby), I was forced to succumb to exaggerated physical ruption to portray my thoughts for the rest of the night.

"Does your throat hurt?"

This was the easiest and most common one. I answered with an emphatic smile and shaking of the head.

"How was your summer?"

A little trickier. I replied with the international "so-so" hand motion to go along with my head bobbing quickly back and forth. This activity was followed by immediate eye contact and an offering as if to say, "And you?"

"Where are you living this year?"

An inquiry that requires a more specific answer. I had to resort to my roommate Courtney for assistance. Having the move down pat, I quickly pointed to Courtney and towards the Fleet Bank in town. Yes, two fingers stands for just two people. And for the record, it's pretty steep rent for two bedrooms, but one with a sweet location.

Feeling confident about my newly acquired language towards the end of the evening, I boldly approached an acquaintance and her friends. I waved a broad "hi" and smiled. She introduced me to her friends and I nodded my head. Then I cringed, realizing that the music was so loud and my predetermined fruitless conversation wasn't going to work out. I grabbed my throat and scratched out, "I lost my voice", and moved on. I hope they didn't think I was choking, or left like throwing up after meeting them.

The highlight of the evening had to be when I wanted a Sprite, but none of my friends could understand what I was saying or chose to ignore my inventive sign language.

> "We, a small but proud minority, either opt to stay in for four years and be miserable, or go out and make people think we are drunk."

But in a flash of brilliance, Court asked the bartender for a napkin and a pen. I jotted down "Sprite, please" and held it up to the bartender as I attempted to explain my predicament by clutching my throat. He laughed, but failed to see the seriousness of it. Desperate, I nudged Court. She told him that, in fact, I really did want a drink. He finally produced my drink.

So maybe I am one up on Britney Spears because she isn't old enough to get into a bar yet. But I guarantee she has never had to wait as long as I did for a Sprite, either.

Searching for the Latin Soul

Latin Pop Music

La Vida Loca

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

The real question that has risen in the recent Latin pop explosion is: Do Latin superstars in the US adequately represent the real essence of Latin music? The hips and music of stars like Ricky Martin and Gloria Estefan are, in fact, more American than not.

Martin grew up listening to rock according to the website www.rickymartin.com. Sure Hollywood resume builders like stars who started doing commercials at age 6, and playing one of the characters on "General Hospital" may be great for his public image, but these hardly give Martin any expertise about Latin music.

Can Martin's music even be considered Latin? Manny Gomez, a senior at the University of Massachusetts and a member of the Registered Student Organization "Concepto Latino" doesn't think so.

"If you really want Latin music, you won't pick a Ricky Martin CD," said Gomez.

Martin is, however, widely endorsed as the Latin icon of America and not only by screaming teenage fans. Time magazine ran a full cover story of Ricky on May 24, 1999 and the Grammys awarded him the "Best Latin Performance" of the year.

Gomez said that music like Martin's is "crossover" music, a formula that works well for US crowds. Martin's squeaky-clean, white-boy image merely reflects the tastes of mostly Caucasian US teenagers except maybe for occasional Spanish words in his songs.

The website run by Ricky Martin's management offices states that Martin possesses "something that only the 'chosen' possess and which is impossible to attain unless you have been born with it." Perhaps it is his

"Give Me Your Heart/ Make it real/ [illegible] it" sings Rob Thomas fronting the Santana [illegible] the past six months, mainstream America [illegible] bombarded by [illegible] sounding pop such as this. From [illegible] to Jennifer Lopez to Enrique Iglesias, Latin music has [illegible] into the spotlight. With that in mind, the Arts & Living section has put together this cover story on Latin pop in hopes of adding informative and entertaining opinions to the current discussion on Latin pop music.

-Adam Martignetti

Collegian Correspondent

Love it or hate it most people will confess to having had the pop ditty, "Living the Vida Loca," hopelessly stuck in their heads at one time or another. This song, coined by a former member of the band Menudo and current superstar teen heartthrob, Ricky Martin, is just one of the many new Latin pop songs taking the American ear by storm.

Some would argue that Martin's music is hardly classifiable as Latin pop, unless musical style suddenly depends on an artist's nationality alone. Jody Rosen of Valley Advocate columnist insists that in Martin's music, "Virtually nothing bears the slightest resemblance to any style of music that might be called 'Latin.'"

So, what is Latin music? Is it specifically a style, such as salsa or merengue? Is it crucial to hear the sound of maracas? Does it depend on the language in which the lyrics are sung?

From a small survey of UMass students, it seems that Latin music is judged by a feeling it invokes as much, if not more than by its sound. When asked, "Upon hearing the term Latin Pop Music, what three adjectives come to mind?", Answers ran the gamut from "crappy" to "happy." People in favor of the music raved about the "spicy," "sexy," "sweaty qualities" of Latin sound.

There is a fiery passion in the music that makes me want to take off my clothes and Lambada all night long. No other music has such a wild effect on me," says freshman Dan Lynch.

Latin pop music can be a great potpourri of elements. While it has many of its own distinguishing trademarks that give it that "saucy" swing, it also borrows from many other genres of music such as rock, blues, jazz and R&B, to name a few.

The thing about Latin music that makes it so special and so popular is that it has a little bit of everything. Latinos, as a people, are generally of mentalities (open mind) unafraid to use anything they find appealing," says Caesar, a New Yorker with Spanish blood.

With many songs that are based on such personal themes as love, heartbreak or pride, Latin music can pluck the strings of human emotion.

For some, this sort of free-flowing sentimentality is detestable. Those who do not approve of Latin pop used condemning adjectives such as "lame, sappy, cheesy and boring" to describe the genre. The last of the three could be probably be correlated with Jennifer ability to fit right into a Backstreet Boys poster while taking advantage of Latin America's reputation for great music.

So why isn't the US getting more of that original merinigue, salsa, cumbia, or other faithful rhythms from South of the Border? What about Native South American music? "You will never hear about them [in the US]," said Gomez.

The lack of publicity and market for more traditional Latin Music may be partially due to ignorance and racism, suggests Gomez.

"The only music that gets promoted is white Latino," Gomez said. "You will never see [something else] nominated to the Grammys." Quite simply, most "true" Latin music does not fit into American mainstream radio. Then again, you won't see Korn or Limp Bizkit topping the radio charts anytime soon either. The solution lies in finding a similar outlet for real Latin music as there is an outlet for alternative radio.

Maybe artists like Ricky Martin aren't bad for Latin Music after all. Max Cabral, a senior at the University of Massachusetts and this year's General Manager of "Concepto Latino," suggests that artists like Gloria Estefan, while not completely faithful to original rythms, "brought more attention to Latin Music."

What about differences in music among Latinos themselves? It seems that not all are unified in their definition of "true" Latin music. In fact, deep divisions may be more characteristic of this genre than any other attribute.

Cubans have traditionally danced the salsa, while Dominicans embrace merengue. Brazilians do the lambada. Who is to determine which of these is more true to the Latin soul?

And so the search goes on. As the Latin American community grows to be one of the major minority groups in the US, it finds itself having to fridge over old rivalries- musical or otherwise- to unite and become stronger. With the recent explosion of successful performers from South and Central America, perhaps Ricky Martin would agree that life is just too loca to worry about any of these questions.

PREREQUISITE: ADRENALINE

Drive. Intensity. Those aren't words you're likely to see in many course requirements. Then again Army ROTC is unlike any other elective. It's hands-on excitement. ROTC will challenge you mentally and physically through intense leadership training. Training that builds your character, confidence and decision-making skills. Again, words other courses seldom use. But they're the credits you need to succeed in life. ROTC is open to freshmen and sophomores without obligation and requires about five hours per week. Register this term for Army ROTC.

Lux 66 returns

Tonight marks the official return of Lux 66 to the Pioneer Valley when they perform at the Bay State in Northampton. A healthy product of the storied UMass music scene, Lux 66 (know as Bongos to Circus in their earlier college days) provides a creative guitar-driven sound with segments of drifting musical arrangements.

Beginning as a "semi-acoustic excuse to make noise in the streets of Amherst center," the band is now a group of high-energy performers that craft music throughout the Boston clubs. They are quickly gaining notoriety by hitting the metro region hard, which has shot their single "(do the) backstroke" in the top ten of Boston.com's music charts.

Their present album, Angels & Devils, is officially being launched this weekend, with a release party scheduled in Boston on Saturday night. It debuted on Rollingstone.com under a month ago.

Lux 66 will perform at the Bay State in Northampton for a 21+ show. The Taints open.

FYI: Fall Premiers... they're coming

The time has come for all new shows to step up to the plate and try to hit their way into your home. This fall, the networks have a total of 46 new series that will try to take their spot in history. As with every new fall season, there tends to be a few standout shows, and a lot of flops that will hardly be remembered at this time next year. It seems apparent to me which shows will make an impact upon their arrival, and which shows will struggle to gain an audience. The cream of the crop

NBC has two shows this year that seem extremely interesting. My preseason pick for the best new series is definitely "The West Wing". Writer Aaron Sorkin creates this new political drama, which stars Martin Sheen as President Josiah Bartlet. (Sorkin's previous work includes the fabulous 1994 film The American President, which starred Michael Douglas and Annete Benning.) "The West Wing" clearly has had the most critical anticipation, and in response NBC has been running commercials for it since the beginning of the summer.

Another sure-hit for NBC is "Third Watch." The drama seems to be a slight rip-off of "ER" and "Chicago Hope", with a little bit of "Rescue 911" mixed in. "Third Watch" follows the life of a group of paramedics and fire fighters who are the first on the scene during accidents. In order for "Third Watch" to be able to stay at the top of the TV charts, it's going to have to be original. If it becomes a pure rip off of every drama series we have seen in the 1990s, it will certainly fail.

FOX has the only other show on television that I think is good enough to be placed in this category.

"Action", the new comedy series starring Jay Mohr and Buddy Hackett, will be tremendous. Mohr, who is best known for his work in Jerry Maguire, brings an enormous amount of talent to this series; that will be the driving force behind its success. Apparently, he also brings quite a bit of offensive humor, because this is the only network sitcom that I have ever seen that runs a warning at the beginning due to language (I think it also received a TV-MA rating, but I'm not sure).

Mohr plays Peter Dragon, a Hollywood agent, who spends his life looking for more talent. While looking for people to work for him, he stumbles upon many current Hollywood superstars, in a guest list that looks like HBO's "Arliss". "Action" will no doubt prove to be one of the funniest new shows of the TV season. Shows that may struggle, but are worth a watch

This category is by far the most abundant. It's difficult to pick which shows are going to be good and which ones are not; that's why this category is the easiest to place them in.

WB is banking their new season on the "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" spin off, "Angel". David Boreanaz became a superstar on "Buffy", playing the love of her life, vampire Angel. After killing him numerous times, each one with a tear in her eye, Buffy will finally let Angel go...to other show. If the show gets as many viewers as it predecessor, "Angel" will be a hit.

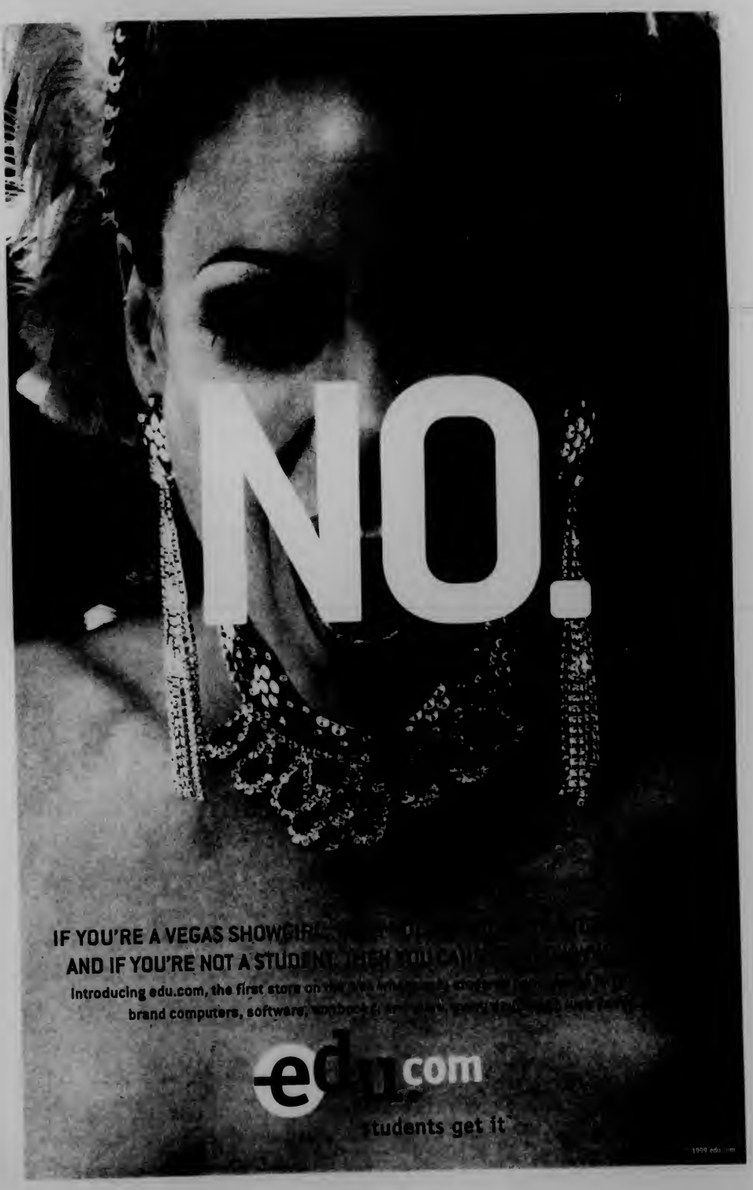
Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

FOX has already premiered its new series "Get Real", I don't think there was an original scene in the hour-long show, and the characters were fake. The only things that saved the show were the comical dialogue and the fact that I, along with fellow TV analyst Mike Delano, found it very easy to make fun of. "Get Real" tries to blend the cheesiness of "Dawson's Creek" with the youth drama of "The Wonder Years", and it simply does not work. Both of the shows from which it steals are excellent series, but "Get Real" is not. Fox will have to do some work to make this one watchable.

WB also has another series that has sparked some interest. "Roswell" is a blend of teen romance and aliens. What combination could be better? The fact of the matter is that the plot seems weak, and the chances of this show being very good are slim. However, I believe that was said about six years ago when a similar show called "Third Rock from the Sun" was premiering. Lithgow proved us all wrong.

NBC's "Freaks and Geeks" seems like it could be worth a watch. A good bulk of high school comedies in the past have dealt with the most popular kids in school, and this series takes a more original approach. If the characters are funny, and the actors (which are a group of unknowns) are strong, the series could definitely take off.

NBC's award winning drama "Law and Order" has created a spin off entitled "Law and Order: Special Victims Unit". Since "Law and Order" is so terrific, it will tough to say that this series will not be good as well.



ABC's only remote possibility of having a decent show comes in the form of "Snoops". Gina Gershon, one of the stars of the horrendous porn film Showgirls, takes the lead in this series from the creator of "Ally McBeal" and "The Practice" David E. Kelley. Kelley, who is now the first person ever to win the Emmy for Best Drama Series and Best Comedy Series in the same year (which by the way makes me sick), will probably be revered and worshiped for this new series. I'm sure that will be un-necessary, since it probably won't be very good.

Instead of these shows, just watch your taped episodes of "Homeboys in Outer Space"

There are a lot of bad shows on tap this year. I think the most pathetic one would have to be the "Party of Five" spin off, "Time of Your Life", staring Jennifer Love Hewitt. After making a handful of terrible films (and being the worst member of "Party of Five"), Hewitt plans to use the only thing she has left (her looks) to become the lead actress on a drama series. Sorry Fox, but your pride and joy for the year is going to be terrible.

ABC has "Oh Grow Up", which is fully equipped with adults acting like they're five years old, and a talking dog. Way to go Disney, you've hit a winner with that one!

Other awful programming will include Fox's "Manchester Prep" and ABC's "Wasteland", and UPN bites it hardcore with both "Shasta McNasty" and, though it will get high ratings, "WWF Smackdown".

brand of hard-nosed defensive play from her home country of Trinidad and Tobago, where she played on the national team. Senior Chrissy Willbauer, quite possibly the fastest player on Shea's roster, has awed both opponents and teammates alike with her stunning abilities on both sides of the ball. Junior Patty Robinson has been the unsung hero of the UM defense, providing consistent excellence and a truly admirable work ethic.

"The backfield is one of the strengths of our team," Shea said. "Anke and Patty allow us offensive chances with their solid play; Kerry Ann is a tough player and she will not let her assignment touch the ball."

Though IMU goalkeeper Amanda Latz has done a fine job in net for the Dukes this season, the edge in Saturday's showdown has to go to UMass tender Zowie Tucker. The Welsh Wonder has brought a new level of athleticism and competitive fire to the position, spoiling countless shots with an aggressive flair not seen since Shea herself stalked the UM goal.

"Zowie Tucker is the best goaltender in the country," Shea said. "She is strong and imposing in the net and is able to control the game."

Backing up Tucker between the pipes is senior co-captain Michelle Crooks, herself a masterful keeper who could start for any other program in the nation. The Pennsylvania native has not allowed a goal since the '97 season, and is the first goalie in school history to serve as captain.

So when Crooks and company assemble on the turf of Richard F. Garrison Field at 1 p.m. on Saturday, they'll be out for more than just another win. They'll be trying to put the cuffs on one of the top field hockey programs on the east coast. For once, here's hoping the Dukes don't escape in a cloud of dust.

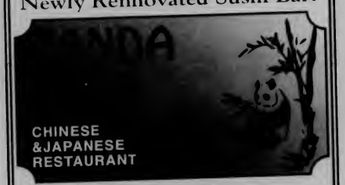
Defenseman make a big hit in National Hockey League

By Larry Wigge
The Sporting News

As much as hockey fans want to see their stars get the same kind of adulation as a Ken Griffey Jr., Karl Malone, or Terrell Davis, the constrictions of the game simply play against them.

Griffey plays well over 50 percent of the time - in the field and on offense - for the Mariners. Malone plays well over 90 percent of the minutes for Utah, and Davis is a workhorse in Denver.

I'll still take the skills and talent and passion of NHL stars who dazzle us on a much more slippery surface than any of the other sports ever are played on. But as much as I hate to say it, the comparisons begin and end when you look at the amount of minutes played by the stars of the three sports.



After all, there are only a handful of the NHL's top scorers who average more than 25 minutes. Twenty-five out of 60 minutes!

Let's face it: The players who are more likely to play 25 to 30 minutes are the top four defensemen for each team.

"If you have the right mix of offensive and defensive skills among your top four defensemen, you can stay on top for a long time. Look at Dallas," says Avalanche Coach Bob Hartley. "They throw the strength and hitting at you when they have Derian Hatcher and Richard Matvichuk out there, and you'd better be prepared for a change of pace to moving the puck up the ice when Sergei Zubov and Darryl Sydor are out there."

"You can talk all you want about Mike Modano and Brett Hull and Joe Nieuwendyk, but those top four defensemen control the game both ways when you play the Stars. Dallas wouldn't have won the Stanley Cup without Hatcher, Matvichuk, Zubov and Sydor."

Lopez, the Latin Pop Princess, who is known as much for her sex appeal as for her music, and maybe more.

Chris Rock, a raunchy comedian, offered Lopez some advice on an MTV award show this month. He surmised, "while Miss Lopez is thanking God and her family for her success, she should be thanking her booty."

Lopez got a launch in her career when in 1997 she played the role of Selena, the slain Tejano star who was believed to have paved the way for other Latin women, making it possible for them to be successful in the music industry.

"If all a person hears is the mainstream, popular and trendy to America version of Latin pop, then it is not hard to understand why it would be considered crap," says Ricardo Rodreguez, a native Venezuelan. "That is the kind of music that makes it to the Top 40 charts here, fluffy and eye-catching. If this same person were to immerse himself in a Latin country, he would hear a music with much more passion, fever and soul-- the opposite of cheese."

Irina Vidomanets, a UMass graduate who was brought up on Latin sound says, "True Latin music touches the romantic side of a person, whether loving romantic or horny romantic. It makes the listeners feel sexy, like they want to feel."

It may be a flash-in-the-pan American trend to suddenly love all things Latin, but most likely we are simply seeing the signs of changing times. According to Newsweek.com, demographics are showing that by the year 2005, Hispanic will undoubtedly be the largest minority group. Other sources insist that this is already the case. Assuming that most Latinos like Latin music, it makes sense that a growing taste for it would be reflected in the popularity charts.

Also, Latin music is not new to America. After all, Spanish was supposedly the first language to be spoken on this continent! For more modern measures, we can listen back into the early 1970s. We'll hear the smooth romantic crooning of Julio Iglesias, the most popular Latin singer of that time, continuing through the 1980s. Although Iglesias sang some English language songs in the beginning of his career, he eventually wrote more of them in Spanish. Regardless, he remained in demand, selling out concerts all over the world.

The Iglesias charm did not end with Julio. His son Enrique is a rival to Ricky Martin's current popularity, as he is belting out festive, make-you-move tunes like "Bailamos" which translates in Spanish to "We dance." Enrique Iglesias records songs in three languages, Spanish, Portuguese and Italian. In a nation growing more multi-cultural by the minute, a tri-lingual singer makes a positive role model, if for that reason alone.

Another band that stretches American Latin pop history back a bit further than toady's sudden explosion is Los Lobos, the twenty year-old band that blends together rock, tex-mex, blues and roots into an unmistakably Latin soup to create their harmonic, yet peppery riffs.

Then there is Gloria Estefan, the forty-something wonder woman who has released ten albums that have all become multi-platinum, platinum or gold. People were ready to do the conga with her before Miss Lopez was even born.

A bit more off-stream, but still well appreciated, judging by American music sales figures, are the Gipsy Kings. MTV.com calls this band an "exotic musical hybrid" with a sound that is dubbed "rumba flamenca" for their vigorous strumming of multiple acoustic guitars and enchanting use of voice, which, by the way, is never in the English language.

Shakira is a young Latina with a lulling, melodic voice. Newsweek.com calls her lyrics "intellectual and gritty" and compares her to her to the melodramatic pop hitter, Alanis Morissette. Her music is a hearty combination of rock and roll angst, reggae vibration and the energy of a Mexican Mariachi band. She explains herself and the overall style of colorful Latin music when she says, "We are made of fusion. It's what determines our identity; the way in one mouthful we take rice, platanos, meat."

Yes, Latin pop music certainly is finding its place in American culture, as are the actual people. Whether the future will hold a calm assimilation into the mainstream or a cataclysmic eruption of Latin fever, no one can know, though Christy Harbegger, editor of Latina, a bilingual magazine dares to make a guess. She says, "The African American civil rights slogan was 'We shall overcome.' Ours is going to be, 'We shall overwhelm.'"

It is hardly surprising that the American culture is broadening its tastes and horizons outwards to encompass other parts of the world. In this day and age with all the high-tech travel and communication systems, our possibilities are virtually endless and our choices almost limitless. The American people can hardly be expected to remain content with what lies in their own, familiar backyards. Mr. Martin is right, we are "Living the Vida Loca," so we must do what we can to keep up.

Defenseman a big plus

By Larry Wigge
The Sporting News

As much as hockey fans want to see their stars get the same kind of adulation as a Ken Griffey Jr., Karl Malone, or Terrell Davis, the constrictions of the game simply play against them.

Griffey plays well over 50 percent of the time - in the field and on offense - for the Mariners. Malone plays well over 90 percent of the minutes for Utah, and Davis is a workhorse in Denver.

I'll still take the skills and talent and passion of NHL stars who dazzle us on a much more slippery surface than any of the other sports ever are played on. But as much as I hate to say it, the comparisons begin and end when you look at the amount of minutes played by the stars of the three sports.

After all, there are only a handful of the NHL's top scorers who average more than 25 minutes. Twenty-five out of 60 minutes!

Let's face it: The players who are more likely to play 25 to 30 minutes are the top four defensemen for each team.

"If you have the right mix of offensive and defensive skills among your top four defensemen, you can stay on top for a long time. Look at Dallas," says Avalanche Coach Bob Hartley. "They throw the strength and hitting at you when they have Derian Hatcher and Richard Matvichuk out there, and you'd better be prepared for a change of pace to moving the puck up the ice when Sergei Zubov and Darryl Sydor are out there."

"You can talk all you want about Mike Modano and Brett Hull and Joe Nieuwendyk, but those top four defensemen control the game both ways when you play the Stars. Dallas wouldn't have won the Stanley Cup without Hatcher, Matvichuk, Zubov and Sydor."

In other words, don't underestimate how important it is for teams that work at keeping four big-minute defensemen intact. And never dismiss the kind of impact quality defensemen can create in the standings.

A subtle reminder of this impact came late on a lazy Friday earlier this month, when the Red Wings signed free agent Steve Duchesne.

Last season, Duchesne was a bust with Los Angeles and Philadelphia after signing a $3.75 million free-agent contract. This time, however, he had to beg to get $1.7 million from Detroit.

But this transaction could go down as the smartest of the summer in the NHL, because Duchesne's puck skills should fit in perfectly with those of holdover defensemen Nicklas Lidstrom, Larry Murphy and Chris Chelios.

And because teams everywhere should be looking for two talented pairs of defensement to be a big part of four-on-four in overtime this season.

Duchesne was clearly a top contributor and logged the third-most minutes for St. Louis behind Al MacInnis and Chris Pronger for a couple of years. His departure hurt the Blues more than it helped the Kings or Flyers.

For Duchesne, working in Detroit will be similar to St. Louis, where the system is built on puck movement. And the puck never stops when you have players on the Red Wings' defense such as Lidstrom, Murphy and Chelios.

In fact, the talent of the four combined is better than Dallas' top defensemen. However, the best chemistry on defense is still in Texas...for now.

Minutewomen head to Army for Eastern regional action

By Matt Seifert
Collegian Correspondent

What is it exactly about New York that makes most New Englanders cringe at its mere mention? Is it the fact that for so many years the Yankees won championship after championship while the Sox came so very close, but no cigar?

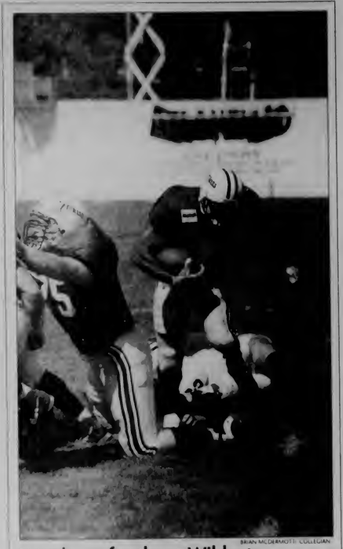
Is it Bucky Dent? Could it be the lets? Whatever the reason may be, New York isn't thought of well by many of those that reside in New England.

This weekend the Massachusetts women's tennis squad has a chance to exact some revenge. The squad, which struggled somewhat last weekend in its season opener in Syracuse, has a chance to leave its mark this weekend. The team will be back in New York to play at the Eastern Championships in West Point, N.Y.

The Minutewomen did struggle in their opener, but they faced some pretty stiff competition from some of the better programs in the country.

It would be hard to say that UMass was the favorite last weekend, but this weekend it is a different story. The Easterns will offer decent competition, but it will be at the hands of opponents that the Minutewomen can handle.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Robyn Lebovitz



There are 15 schools in the tournament, including top foes Fordham, Howard, Seton Hall and Army. However, the Minutewomen may be the cream of the crop, something coach Judi Dixon thinks should be good for her squad.

"I think we are one week better than we were last week. Instead of going into this weekend as the underdog, I think we will be going in as one of the favorites," she said. "So now I expect the kids to step it up a pace. I think we like being one of the favorites. It is a role we handle well. Everybody seems to step up their game and their confidence really helps, too."

While the Minutewomen may be favored, they should be more than leery of a letdown. Army, who is hosting the event, is by no means a slouch. Last year was a breakout season for the Cadets, as they compiled an 18-8 record, which was only one win short of the school record that they set back in 1984.

Last season Army absolutely demolished their conference competition, beating their opponents by an average score of 8-1. The Cadets did not stop there however, as they took care of rivals Lafayette and Lehigh to earn a berth in the NCAA Tournament.

UMass will hand Army a formidable group of opponents for singles play. The singles unit is made up of senior Ola Gerasimova, sophomore Annie Hamilton, sophomore Helena Horak and freshman Katie Stammen. In doubles action, junior Robyn Lebovitz and freshman Beth Ebert team up to form one pair, while April Madani and Lauren Perry make up the other.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT/ COLLEGIAN
Watch out for those Wildcats
Junior All-American Marcel Shipp will lead the Massachusetts football team into Philadelphia this weekend to battle Villanova in an Atlantic 10 matchup.

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may be getting quite close to a major goal today, but before it is within your reach, you're going to have to deal with a major distraction.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may have to carry more than your share of the weight today, but you can surely do it, especially if it means giving a friend a helping hand.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're going to want to get someone interested in you today, and it's not likely to be easy. Turn on the charm, but also be ready to think.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Your schedule is likely to pick up considerably today, and the need for a manageable pace is absolute. Don't lose control!

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 10) – Short-term endeavors are favored today, but you needn't set aside that long-term project altogether. Reach for what is attainable.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – What appears "out of the blue" today may prove to be dangerous, and you'll want to be well-equipped to deal with any related crisis.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) – This can be a highly fulfilling day, particularly when you are dealing with youngsters. You can learn just as much as you teach today.

Aries (March 20-April 19) – You may be able to take something quite conventional and raise the stakes considerably, turning it into something new and exciting.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) – It may be up to you today to corral the efforts of those around you and focus everyone's attention on one single essential objective.

Gemini (May 21-June 20) – Look back at your most recent success and ask yourself what made it possible. Today, the answer will point you in the right direction.

Cancer (June 21-July 22) – Now is the time for you to make amends with someone with whom you've had a strained relationship for some time. Compromise, because it's no one's fault!

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be able to make one or two surprising and remarkable claims today. Stand behind them one hundred percent. The sky's the limit today!

UMass Women's Soccer ready for two big games

Minutewomen prepare to tackle Old Dominion, William and Mary

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The schedule dictates the Massachusetts women's soccer team will play two games in Williamsburg, Va. this weekend in a two-day tournament conducted by the college of William and Mary. Mother Nature, however, may have some other ideas on her mind.

With Hurricane Floyd barreling up the eastern seaboard, it is expected that inclement weather will hit the Virginia coastline at some point over the next few days. That may wreak havoc for the four teams in the tournament, who come in to Williamsburg hoping to squeeze two games in.

Besides UMass (2-1-1) and host William and Mary, Old Dominion and San Diego State will round out the field. The Minutewomen will play ODU on Friday at noon before taking on the host Tribe on Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m.

The Lady Monarchs of Old Dominion come into the weekend with a 3-2 record. ODU defeated the University of North Carolina-Greensboro, Campbell College and Virginia Tech, but lost to Rutgers and Monmouth.

"From the scouting report that we've got, Old Dominion is one of the most dangerously physical teams that their opponents have faced," Massachusetts' women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "UNC-Greensboro lost three players in one game."

Sunday's opponent, William and Mary, is coming off one of its most successful seasons in school history, and this year the winning ways have continued for the Tribe. Despite a deceiving 3-2 record, coach John Daly's squad is currently ranked in the Top 20.

Last year the two teams met in Amherst, with the Tribe coming out on top 5-2 in the UMass Classic. William and Mary holds a 4-2-2 lead in the all-time series, which dates back to 1984.

"William and Mary is a very good team who has played a power-packed schedule so far," Rudy said.

In its five games thus far, the Tribe has beaten East Carolina, George Washington and George Mason. Their two losses came at the hands of Clemson and California.

Leading the way for the Tribe will be All-American Missy Wycinsky, Lindsay Nohl and Jordan Kreiger. At press time Wycinsky and Kreiger were battling for the team lead in points with 11 and 10, respectively.

As for the Minutewomen, they are coming off a tough 2-1 loss to Texas Christian University on Sunday afternoon in Amherst. UMass had a 1-0 lead with 25 minutes left before the Horned Frogs rallied back to earn the win.

That loss fell on the heels of a draining 1-0 win over the University of Alabama-Birmingham on Saturday. The two teams were originally supposed to play on Friday, but heavy rains pushed the contest back a day.

"We weren't fit enough to play two games back to back, and I think that we could have done much better with our decision making if we had played on Friday and Sunday," Rudy said. "We forced some people who weren't fit to play two 90 minute games. And when your body says no, your mind stops thinking too."

Mental and physical lapses did hurt the Minutewomen on the two TCU goals on Sunday. In addition, UMass may have fallen into a TCU trap, in which the Horned Frogs complained about officiating all afternoon.

"We weren't prudent with our decisions down the stretch and we sort of bit into the whining from their players and coaching staff," Rudy said. "Hopefully we learned that we can't do that. We can't let whining interfere with our playing on the field, and I think that it did the other day."

Rudy also noted that an abundance of fouls were a problem in the TCU contest, another issue which he hopes to improve on this weekend. Two UMass fouls resulted in free kicks that started the two TCU goals.

"We gave up too many free kicks and we paid the price for it," he said. "That's where we lost the game."

"Hopefully we can get things sorted out this week [in practice]. We have some corrections to make," added Rudy.

UMass field hockey in hot pursuit of James Madison Dukes

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Somedays the mountain might get 'em, but the law never will.

The Massachusetts field hockey team will try to play the part of the mountain on Saturday, when the Dukes come tearing into Amherst. That's the Dukes of James Madison University, not the infamous country cousins from Hazzard County.

These Dukes carry a 3-1 record and the No.8 ranking in the nation, not compound bows with exploding arrows. These Dukes ride the immense talent of All-American back and team scoring leader Katrina Hunter, not an orange Dodge with a Confederate flag on the roof. And these Dukes run an explosive, high-scoring offense, not some backwoods moonshine ring.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Anke Bruemmer

"Our offense is dynamic, powerful, and precise," said JMU Coach Christy Morgan, who has guided the Dukes to a 118-59-2 record in her eight seasons at the helm. "Our forwards are fighters with the skill to consistently finish; we've got divers, scrappers, and scorers."

With divers and scrappers, one might assume the Dukes are coming to Amherst to search for sunken treasure. Actually, JMU is looking for its fourth win in five contests in '99. The Dukes opened this season by shelling Towson 6-0 and sinking Duke by a final of 6-1. Saturday will mark their first road contest of this young season.

No.19 UMass, meanwhile, opened the '99 campaign with a "flash", beating up on Colgate by a final of 4-0 on September 1st. A tough overtime loss to Virginia was followed up by a strong showing against cross-state rival Boston College, which saw the Minutewomen prevail 1-0. Then came a brutal defeat at the hands of No.2 Maryland, 7-0. Had the Maroon and White hit an early season wall?

"This was simply a matter of us not playing like we know we can," said UM Coach Patty Shea after the loss. "Too many of our players were trying to do too much individually."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jill Fantasia

The talent is certainly there for the up-and-coming Minutewomen. Greenfield native Kristen Schmidt has shown flashes of brilliance at the forward position, including a goal against Colgate and an assist versus the Vols.

Fellow frontline standouts Lindsay Abbott, Nicole Bardell, Kaitlyn Byron, Tamra Gersyk, and Julie Celentano have stormed opposing nets all year, and Shea has an arsenal of young scorers waiting to blossom in freshmen Stacey Blue, Sarah Bohonowicz, Krysta Johnson, and Erika Whiston. Merrimack transfer Jayna Napolitano, who led the Warriors in scoring as a freshman, further bolsters the UMass attack.

JMU will counter with the dynamic duo of Liz Sanders and Julie Martinez, junior forwards who share the Duke lead for goals scored with four each.

The Maroon and White midfield is the domain of junior co-captain Lucy Koch, who has started since her freshman year with a fantastic balance of strength, mobility, and stickhandling skills. Also patrolling the Mass middle is sophomore Jill Fantasia, who can make opposing offenses disappear with her outstanding footwork and field vision.

UM's midfield of the future looks solid, with newcomers Kristin Hopwood, Deb Morris, and Julie Petercuskie all eager to step in and crank up the intensity for the Minutewomen.

The Duke middle is equally formidable, anchored by seniors Coleen Kreiger and Julie Weiss. Both have notched 16 career goals at JMU.

"With Coleen's experience and competitiveness and the contributions of the other players, they have the ability to play solid, controlled defense and provide an explosive offense," said Morgan.

Shea's backfield roster is, in a word, jacked. German import Anke Bruemmer has been nothing short of dominant in '99, after leading the '98 squad in scoring as a freshman with 12 goals. Fellow second-year star Kerry-Ann Jaggassar has brought a thrilling

Cuomo delivers AC address on social responsibility

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

AMHERST – America's economic success doesn't guarantee that everything is as good as it gets. Speaking about room for improvement, former New York Governor Mario Cuomo delivered a lecture entitled "Individualism vs. Community" at Amherst College yesterday.

Cuomo addressed the group of mostly first-year AC students as "among the gifted" and said that it was their responsibility to improve the country.

"The economy is terrific. No one has ever seen an economy this big. Yes, we're the greatest nation, but that shouldn't satisfy you," Cuomo said.

He believes that the country can do better than it presently is, and it was for this reason that he chose to turn down a position on the Supreme Court. Cuomo said that it is more important for him to make a difference by speaking to the public on what's wrong with the country than it is to continue his political career.

"We are not as good as we should be. We are not as good as we could be. We lead the world in imprisonment and violence," Cuomo said.

He pointed out that regardless of how well the economy looks, there are still millions of people living in poverty. One out of every four children grows up below the poverty threshold.

His example was straightforward. A 37 year-old woman with two children and no health plan is trying to support her family with $28,000 a year when she gets cancer. What can she do? Her options are few and will most likely force her into bankruptcy.

Forty-three million other people in this country face the same problems, Cuomo said "with all our power and wealth," this situation should not be so common.

Cuomo plans to continue speeches similar to the one yesterday (which was sponsored by the Croxton Lecture Fund) to inform the public, especially those in our generation, of what the politicians are not saying.

"There are more rich people than ever before. I'm all for more rich people, there's nothing wrong with ambition, but at the same time the gap between the working and the upper class is larger than it's ever been," Cuomo said.

The majority of workers are not highly skilled and therefore have little opportunities in our economy to "get ahead", according to Cuomo. Their income is not increasing as they continue to work.

"I do feel like I have failed as a politician," Cuomo said, explaining that there are still many more poor individuals in the country. "There are people more worse off in New York than when I was first elected."

Cuomo asked the audience to imagine how great this country could be, and to take action to get it to that point. Cuomo strongly believes that everyone should first rely on personal resources, and then turn to the government. Programs such as health care cannot be successful without the government. He said the country's success comes down to the idea of "interconnection and interdependency".

Cuomo believes that the country can be "dazzling" if we work together to share and educate.

"In your time, you can do that," Cuomo said.

Governer Mario Cuomo lectured yesterday to an Amherst College audience.

Palmer speaks at conference

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

Nationally renowned author and teacher Parker Palmer called for an immediate change in the way universities view higher education at a luncheon at the Campus Center yesterday.

After completing a 3-day conference at the University of Massachusetts that involved visiting a diverse community of students and educators, Palmer praised the efforts UMass is making to engage in non-traditional learning opportunities, such as the Learning Communities Network and Project Mosaik.

The Learning Communities Network examines ways in which students can enhance their academic experience with learning in a co-curricular setting.

Project Mosaik focuses on multicultural community development within residence halls.

"I have been deeply impressed by the quality of the discussion going on here," he said.

Palmer spoke of our current academic culture as "not a culture that respects much emotion," and added that "emotion is a driver of knowing."

An example cited by Palmer was the prevailing notion, popular before the 1950s, that women couldn't be successful in mathematics. He argued that while women have always been capable in the sciences, they have been taught from a young age to believe that they weren't as talented as men.

That message brought on fear that shut down women's thinking ability, thus feeding the misconception.

Palmer also spoke of the tendency to hypercriticize in our academic culture, which teaches us to look at everything bad rather than anything good. Such culture engenders fear, which hinders our ability to learn.

Palmer stressed how important personal emotions are to learning. "Good scientists are not without passion," he said. "Discoveries are too few and far between."

Palmer criticized the notion of objectivism in learning, calling it a "pathology" that causes disconnection and inhibits real learning.

Pointing out the fault of personal disconnection from education, he talked about his own experience of learning about the Holocaust.

"I grew up believing that somehow all of this happened on another planet," he said.

At the same time, he said, he didn't realize that Jews were being discriminated against in his own neighborhood in Chicago.

"Disconnection is regarded as a high virtue [in higher learning]," said Palmer. "[but] it is not a faithful rendition of how anybody learned anything."

Full time student Runs taxi service; Redcab thriving

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Correspondent

Being enrolled in school full time while also trying to work a part time job is often difficult for any student. But trying to operate a personal business is definitely a different type of challenge. Twenty-six year old junior John Sheean knows all about the work that goes into managing a thriving company.

Sheean, a Wildlife Biology major originally from Hudson, started his own taxi service this past July. He said that he got the idea to start the business because "the campus buses weren't running late enough to pick up students," and "many students were worried about drunk driving on campus."

The business began when Sheean leased a cab from a business in Chicopee. He began his own personal company, which he named Redcab and sent out fliers to establish himself. He also established a good reputation through word-of-mouth advertising.

Sheean said he often drives from about 5 a.m. to about 1 a.m. of the proceeding day, and allows up to four passengers in his cab at any given time. His business now runs all year, and he has been transporting passengers to different destinations both on and off campus for several months.

"All kinds of people use the cab service – students, older people and people just visiting town," Sheean said.

Sheean's clientele is the largest part of his business, though. There are only two people who drive for his one-cab taxi service. In addition, Sheean explained that he was "the only legal taxi cab in the town of Amherst."

"I am the only cab and so I have to try to leave town in a quick amount of time," to get from place to place, Sheean said. He hopes to solve this problem by adding another cab to the road within the next couple of weeks.

Although the job can sometimes be difficult, Sheean maintains that the good aspects outweigh the bad.

"The best part about the job is that I get to help people on the community level," Sheean said. Sheean also enjoys working for himself.

Despite the fact that his business is fairly new, Sheean remains optimistic about its future.

"I plan to keep going with the business and just see what happens," Sheean said.

Many students, and even a few Amherst residents are still oblivious to the existance of taxi service here. Amy Ciccarelli, an Amherst resident who teaches special education at nearby Ware High School, has lived here for three years without ever even seeing a single cab.

"I'm sure that once school started, and the town's population doubled, there was a definite need for some type of alternative to the current public transportation system," said Ciccarelli. "The fact that the PVTA buses don't run 24-7 must create a need for taxi service." In fact, the buses don't run at all on weekends during the summer.

And that suits the folks at Redcab just fine.

Young vandals nabbed after parking lot spree

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

While the University of Massachusetts was playing the University of New Hampshire last weekend in football, others were doing some "repairs" of their own.

Three local juveniles were caught spray-painting automobiles near the maze in the football stadium parking lot on UMass Police. The youths spray-painted 15 cars with red and black spray-paint before leaving to go to the football game. The youths cannot be identified because they are not 18.

"Some of the cars were spray painted on windows, others on hubcaps, others on the actual bodies of the car," said Barbara O'Connor, Deputy Chief of the UMass Police Department. "It was just malicious and it caused damage that is going to cost, in total, well over a thousand dollars to repair."

O'Connor, who was at the football game, happened upon one of the victims of the vandalism.

"There were some kids who saw these three juveniles doing what they were doing, and they helped us out," O'Connor said. "We got a description of the clothing they were wearing and we put that out on the radio. They [were]

Hurricane Floyd: a truly moving experience

By Sue Anne Pressley
Washington Post

Hurricane Floyd may be remembered for this benchmark if nothing else: the historic number of people it sent packing.

As it plowed up the southeast coast, 1.5 million Floridians were ordered to leave, followed shortly by 500,000 Georgia residents, all 800,000 residents of the South Carolina coast, and 500,000 in North Carolina. Still others living in its path farther north were bound to follow suit.

The shoreline emptied. And nearly everyone except police officers, jail inmates and the sickest of hospital patients seemed to be on the road to anywhere away from Floyd. They were anxious and reluctant participants in what federal officials have termed the largest mass evacuation in the nation's history.

Overall, the exodus drew praise from emergency officials, who said it acted almost as a test of how smoothly the detailed evacuation plans devised by various state and local governments could work, and how swiftly residents could marshal themselves when faced with a monstrous natural phenomenon. They said it was too soon to calculate economic losses from shuttered factories, canceled airline flights and deserted tourist attractions.

Artists, activists promote ECOnference

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Correspondent

Anticipating the thirtieth anniversary of Earth Day, over 2,200 student environmentalists around the country have already signed on to participate in ECOnference 2000.

The conference, which will take place from Oct. 15-17 at the University of Pennsylvania, has already generated interest in the local community. According to Anitha Williams, field organizer for the conference, the main goal of the event is to help students learn how to be better activists in their own college campuses.

Students will have an opportunity to get further involved in environmental issues in a variety of ways. Williams explained that the conference will showcase such well-known environmental activists as Lois Gibbs and Ralph Nader.

Also on the agenda for the conference is music from artists including Rusted Root, Spearhead, Perry Farrell and Mickey Hart from the Grateful Dead. In addition, students will have an opportunity to speak with members from environmental groups such as Greenpeace, Students for a Free Tibet, the Student PIRGs and the Sierra Student Coalition.

There will also be a vast array of workshops and discussion sections which students can sign up to get involved with. Williams explained that students can choose from over 200 workshops that focus on subjects ranging from direct environmental action and corporate accountability for environmental issues to media coverage of the environment.

"We are seeking to get student activists envisioning and shaping the environmental movement for the next millennium," Williams said with regards to the goals of the conference.

Environmental activists in the Amherst area are raising awareness for the conference as well. These activists are spreading information about genetically-engineered BT pesticides that create mutated corn pollen. These BT pesticides were introduced into the environment about two years ago by the Monsanto Corporation.

According to Williams, the company did not do research on the effects of the pesticides to the wildlife population in the area. Due to these pesticides, over 50% of the Monarch butterfly population in the country has been rapidly annihilated. In order to increase awareness about this situation, student activists have begun carrying with them a ten-foot Monarch butterfly to explain to students the severity of the situation.

The situation regarding the Monarch butterfly is another issue that will be addressed at the conference. Another portion of the agenda at the conference is plans for a group-wide job boycott. The participants of the ECOnfrence plan on refusing to work for the twelve most environmentally irresponsible companies in the country.

This list of companies is due to be released on Oct. 5, and will include businesses from a host of major industry areas including engineering, computer and chemical manufacturing companies, retail businesses, automotive companies, and professional consulting groups.

Williams explained that the conference is trying to boycott, "companies that are working against public health."

The Conference is still looking for people that may be interested in helping to improve the environment.

"The first Earth Day 30 years ago was a hallmark of student activism, and we hope to reestablish this for the future," Williams said.

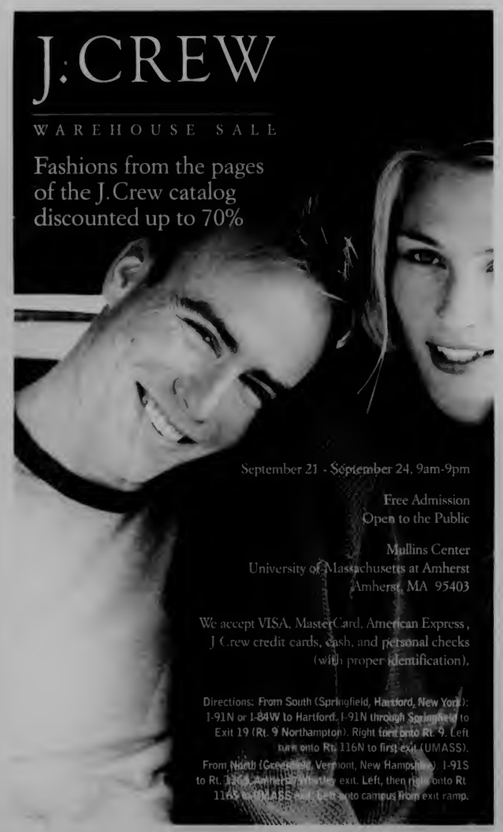
gone to the football game, and that is where we later picked them up."

The investigation into the vandalism is ongoing at this point, O'Connor said, noting that no charges have been filed.

"The only reason charges haven't been filed is that this is an ongoing investigation, the dollar amount is extensive, and we have to contend with the fact that these are juveniles," O'Connor said.

The victims of the vandalism, meanwhile, are doing their own investigating. They are now soliciting estimates for how much it would cost to remove the spray paint.

According to Jamie Canne at Cahillan Auto Body, if a car needed to be completely repainted, and it was brand new, it could cost up to $1,000.



"The cost of a repair like that would depend on the color and size of a vehicle," Canne said, "but if that person waits, the price is going to go up because it will be harder to get the paint off of the automobile."

Charlie Handschuh, the manager of King Auto Body in Northampton, said that the damage caused by the spray paint was going be "a very subjective thing".

"Maybe we could get it off with chemicals, or maybe it would have to be repainted," Handschuh said, "but no shop's going to know until they have a chance to look at it."

O'Connor declined to comment on whether or not the youths' parents have agreed to pick up the tab.

"At first the juveniles weren't even cooperating, and now we are at least getting that," O'Connor said. She said that she expects the investigation to conclude in the next couple of days, and then move forward with charges.

Travelers grumbled about their interminable journeys, however, complaining it took 14 hours in some cases to reach havens that were normally a four-hour drive away. Charleston Mayor Joseph Riley publicly criticized South Carolina Gov. Jim Hodges, D, for delays Tuesday in opening all lanes of jammed Interstate 26 to westbound traffic as frustrated evacuees crept away to safety.

Hodges' press secretary, Nina Brook, said the frustration is understandable, and that the lanes-reversal and other streamlining measures will be quicker next time. In a Thursday teleconference with emergency officials and other governors, Hodges discussed how the interstate system was overburdened as evacuees from Florida and Georgia streamed north in search of safer ground and what could be done to relieve the problem.

All lanes on Interstate 26 lanes were shifted eastbound yesterday as officials turned to the next task: getting everyone back home. "Traffic is slow," Brook said, "but at least it's moving."

"Overall, we've never moved so many people so far with so few problems," said David Bruns, a spokesman for the Florida Emergency Operations Center in Tallahassee. "It was astonishing it went as well as it did, but of course, you probably didn't feel that way if you were sitting in a car for hours."

The approaching storm – and all the attendant publicity about its size and onetime might – apparently spurred even some of the most diehard anti-evacuees to run.

The results were awesome as caravans of families with small children and unhappy pets inched along jammed interstates; motels filled up so quickly that rumors spread that the nearest empty rooms were in Tennessee; and impromptu shelters at churches and volunteer fire departments welcomed overnight guests.

Gates spends $1billion on college aid for minorities

By Rene Sanchez
Washington Post

LOS ANGELES – Microsoft Corporation Chairman Bill Gates yesterday pledged to spend $1 billion over the next 20 years giving college scholarships to thousands of academically talented but financially needy minority students across the country. The gift would be the largest philanthropic gesture ever in education.

Gates, the world's wealthiest person, has never made a bigger contribution to any single cause and this one is almost without rival in the nation's history. It equals the amount that media mogul Ted Turner committed to the United Nations' humanitarian program two years ago.

In an announcement yesterday morning from Seattle, Gates said that he is creating the scholarships because he believes too many minority students are not reaching or finishing college – and in particular pursuing degrees in medicine, science and technology – strictly because the expense of doing so is often too great.

"This country it in an incredible time period. The advances in technology are really quite breathtaking," Gates said. "Is everybody getting a chance to benefit? The answer is really no."

With the gift, Gates is taking aim at one of the most intractable problems in higher education: improving access to college for minorities and closing the gap in academic achievement that often still exists between their groups and white students on campuses. The proportion of minorities enrolling in college is rising, as is federal aid for tuition. But for many earning degrees, especially advanced ones, is still difficult.

For Gates, the billion-dollar pledge also could serve other purposes. Some critics have charged that he has not been devoting enough of his staggering wealth – his net worth is estimated at nearly $90 billion – to charities.

Until now, Gates' largest donation to one cause was $100 million to help immunize young children from disease in developing countries around the world.

Why heroes fall

I spent this past summer working in child-care. While this is not a job that normally allows for extensive, heated debates, a co-worker and I had one such disagreement over the controversial Hall of Fame induction of former New York Giants star Lawrence Taylor. Taylor was arguably the greatest NFL linebacker of all time. With a combination of athleticism, tenacity, and a brilliant football mind, the two-time Super Bowl winner single-handedly altered how the game was played. Clearly, Taylor is Hall of Fame material. The problem: he has a very nasty, protracted cocaine addiction that has resulted in numerous arrests. The sentiment in some circles was that Taylor's notorious habits rendered him unfit for such an illustrious honor. On a wider scale, the question is whether or not a celebrity with an ignominious personal life deserves to be awarded for outstanding achievement in his or her public career.

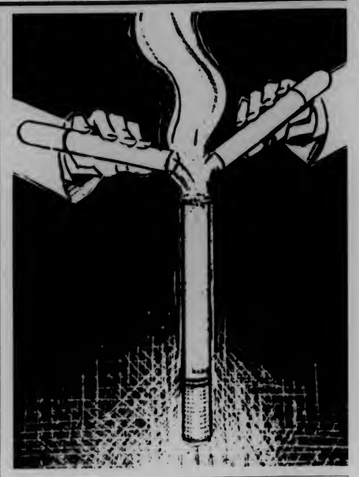
My friend took the position that personal missteps negate professional excellence on the gridiron. He argued that Taylor's repeated drug convictions were an embarrassment to the Giants, the NFL, and to young fans especially. I countered that the Hall of Fame recognizes players for the skill with which they play the game of football. The voters are not handed a dossier outlining the personal history of the candidates. Membership in the Hall of Fame says nothing about the total worth of an individual.

Far from a meaningless disagreement by two underpaid, under-stimulated college guys, I believe our conversation highlights the strange juxtaposition of professional skill and personal greatness in American culture. We are taught to seek out heroes among those individuals who excel in a particular discipline, whether it be athletics, politics, or entertainment. Ask a third grade classroom to list their idols and you would most likely hear names such as Michael Jordan, Britney Spears, or Tara Lipinski. I have witnessed this phenomenon repeatedly during my years in child-care.

Richard Anderson

The gravitation of children toward celebrities is understandable. Kids are often dazzled by glitz and glamour. However, when the hopes and dreams of a child are embodied in a total stranger he or she can be very easily disappointed by the failings of that person. Parents reinforce this precarious celebrity worship by encouraging their children to "Be Like Mike," as the old commercial said. I remember the mother of one boy on my Little League team shouting to her son as he struggled on the mound, "C'mon, Sicky. Roger [Clemens] doesn't give up!" Yes, but maybe Roger beats his wife. How does she know? Parents teach their children to idolize celebrities but become incensed when these people fail to live up to expectations. It is a role that many of these celebrities did not seek.

You may recall the uproar several years ago when Charles Barkely appeared in a series of television commercials in which he said quite pointedly, "I am NOT a role model." Parents and coaches were shocked that Barkely showed such utter contempt for his exalted position. Utah Jazz star Karl Malone even wrote an editorial response in Sports Illustrated saying, in effect, that Barkely had an obligation to fulfill his duty as a role model, regardless of whether or not he had sought the role. The implication of Malone's logic is that the title of "hero" can be involuntarily bestowed upon celebrities who are then expected to live up to that high standard, even if they are unaware of their status. That is quite a burden for a person who struggles through a day-to-day life just like the rest of us.



Suppose that a ten-year-old boy suddenly decides to idolize Alec Baldwin. When the boy learns that Alec has been arrested for punching a guy at a nightclub (hey, it's happened before) he tearfully confronts the actor, saying, "You let me down, Mr. Baldwin. Now I don't know what to believe in!" To which Alec would respond: "How the hell was I supposed to know I was your hero?" I do not condone wanton acts of violence by Alec Baldwin. But if he assaults a person and is arrested, then any disappointment should be felt by his family and friends, not some kid in Kansas.

Admiration of successful people is inevitable. In many disciplines, studying the career paths of successful individuals is necessary so as to determine the components of their achievement. However, parents must teach children to admire the skill while not necessarily admiring the person. When my beloved Detroit Pistons lost to the Chicago Bulls during the 1991 NBA playoffs, the Pistons contemptuously walked off the court before the final seconds expired so as to avoid shaking hands with their bitter rivals. My father turned to me and said, "If you think that's cool, fine. But that was the most disgusting unsportsman-like behavior I've ever seen."

The vehemence of my father's disdain taught me that sometimes athletes, even great athletes, do loathsome things. Consequently, I have always viewed athletes, and celebrities in general, with a healthy amount of suspicion. The films created by Bob Fosse and Woody Allen are very close to my heart. But the personal relationships they created are filled with betrayal and abuse. I choose to admire their films, not their marriages.

Similarly, although Lawrence Taylor has made many costly mistakes, he deserves a spot in the Hall of Fame. If my son decides to become a linebacker I will suggest that he study Taylor. I will also teach him that the inspiration derived from celebrity heroes is fleeting and hollow. We would do better as parents, and as a society, to look inward instead of outward for role models. Why not idolize a parent, relative, friend, or teacher? A hero gleaned from one's own life is much more likely to be admired on the basis of courage, personal integrity, and moral consistency. Our personal heroes may still disappoint us, but when they do we will know the specific circumstances of their failing rather than a tabloid headline. We may even learn from their mistakes. So, my favorite directors: Woody Allen and Bob Fosse. My hero: my dad.

Phobias and fears

Hey pal, how 'bout you put that monster away before someone loses an eye! Yeah snakeman, I'm talking to you. To the guy who spent Monday afternoon standing atop the bridge of the Murrill science building with a Boa Constrictor wrapped around his body. I just want to thank you for setting off an adrenaline rush in my body complete with trembling and the desire to crawl into the fetal position. I guess it may take a guy with a snake to help you realize how scared you are of those nasty reptiles, but that's what happened to me earlier this week.

There are actually people who don't wash their clothes, because they're afraid of getting sick from laundry soap. Hello, it's soap!

Ryan Benharris

The truth is, I'm not really sure why I'm scared of snakes, or anything at all for that matter. All I know is that the minute I saw it, something triggered that told my brain I was in significant danger, which was clearly untrue. I know I'll probably end up taking some heat for this, but I'll admit it, I'm a sissy! I'm afraid of pretty much everything, and am about as brave as Bill Murray in What About Bob? When I saw that awful film this summer about the three morons who went into the woods looking for witches, I didn't sleep for two weeks.

However, the one thing that I can say is that I am not alone. Fear is something that we all experience at some point and we all have to deal with. There are a lot of observations I have made about fear, and what we're afraid of.

Sometimes the things I used to be afraid of seem funny to me. I remember when I was afraid of flushing the toilet at night, because the noise might bring about some sort of evil thing that somehow got into my house without anyone else knowing, and was there only to take me out. Now I'm not sure where the logic is – that the noise of a flushing toilet would somehow make this thing upset, nor did I realize that if it was there to kill me, it'd probably do it while I was sleeping, and not wait until after I had finished pissing. The irony in this whole situation is that now I'm an RA, and just last week, I had to put a sign up in my bathroom reminding the residents on my floor to flush when they're done.

Sometimes other people's fears seem funny to me. For instance, I know a girl who is deathly afraid of traveling over bridges. She refuses to drive over them herself, and if she's in the car when someone else is driving over a bridge, she has to close her eyes. One time I spent the entire trip over the Sagamore Bridge swerving from one side to the other while she refused to look. I still have the black eye.

The most fun people to harass about their fears are definitely siblings. For all of you "only children" out there, you're missing out on this one. You can't truly understand what I mean when I say that my childhood was spent tormenting my brother by sneaking up on him, or throwing things at him, or whatever else I could do to get his blood pressure up, unless you have experienced it.

Along with fear comes superstition. I'm not a superstitious person by any means, but some people are just crazy. There are actually people who don't wash their clothes, because they're afraid of getting sick from laundry soap. Hello, it's soap! They taught me in 8th grade health class that soap prevents illness. (They also taught me that the funniest thing in the entire world is when you put 25 teenage guys in a room, with an old man who says "penis" about 100 times). Some people base their lives on superstition, and I personally think that's plain worthless. If you're walking under a bridge near Morrill, and some guy has a snake up above you, no lucky penny, gold chain or rabbit foot is going to save you if snakeman decides it's time to play "catch the Boa."

Fear is extremely exaggerated at night. It's obvious why people feel less safe in the dark than they do in the daylight. In my hometown, nothing ever happens, and I have never had a real threat in my entire life. However, I still refuse to walk from my car to my front door unless I'm packin' heat.

What I've discovered about fear is that it's unavoidable. If something goes bump in the night, you're going to immediately assume it's Chucky from Child's Play, and not the kid who live next door to you throwing a tennis ball up against the wall; that's human nature. The best way to deal with fear is not to confront it, but to forget it exists. If you don't spend your life thinking about what you're afraid of, you won't feel as unsafe.

Even though I say I'm a baby, I get by. Of course, there is only one thing I'm truly afraid of: "Carmen!"

Diversity Shmiversity

A few of you out there in UMass land may have noticed the heavy promotion of diversity around here. If you haven't, well, the more power to you in your life at the bottom of the campus pond. I'm going to get a little radical and suggest that this almost fanatic atmosphere towards diversity is misguided. What we really need these days is a little unity.

"It is more likely that we will respect something we can understand. Diversity Gen-Eds are good in that way, but threats and policies are not."

Christine Ravinski

Don't get me wrong; our differences are the spice of life that makes it all so much fun. But frankly, this university (and probably the country in general) has swallowed the whole bottle of Mrs. Dash for breakfast. When our differences are promoted with such extremism, we really do push ourselves away from each other. After working so hard to set ourselves apart we can find ourselves very alone. Y2K is coming, people! Who needs to be lonely?

The demands for respect of all different peoples has the dangerous side effect of making different groups just that: something different, something other. The more loudly these differences are proclaimed, the more strongly we feel an "Us" and "Them" relationship in our subconsciouses. It is not in our natures to admire and respect that which we feel is alien from us simply because we are told to. It is more likely that we will respect something we can understand. Diversity Gen-Eds are good in that way, but threats and policies are not.

Thus we have our very diverse tables at the DC's, with very little boundary crossing. This is a terrible habit to carry out into the real world. Being constantly driven to find differences in each other instead of our wonderful similarities does not lead down the flowers path of brotherly love, as implied in Gorman this week. Tuesday the Collegian carried an article about the racial graffiti found there with a picture of a woman looking so terrified one would think yesterday's meatloaf surprise had just stood up for comment in the back of the room.

Salwa Shamapande was quoted as saying "I don't feel like diversity is a part of this education." Brace yourselves my friends – I have a feeling we're about to be pelted with another attack of pamphlets and speeches warning us to love diversity. Let me suggest some alternative points to ponder as we tote these pamphlets dutifully from the mailbox to the recycling bin.

We're all students. We're pretty much all in the same boat. We stand in line together at Whitmore, we've survived the Dining Commons food together, and we will all get attacked by swans from time to time.

At a deeper level, anthropologist Donald E. Brown has found in his review "Human Universals" hundreds of commonalties of the human experience today. Ethnological archives (as varied and strange as they may be) show that in groups all of us gossip, all of us make fun of each other, all of us cry, and all of us play. In every culture there is somebody afraid of snakes. All peoples everywhere recognize facial expressions of happiness, sadness, anger, fear, surprise, disgust, and contempt. We all also mask, modify, and mimic those expressions. Every culture knows about drugs, both medicinal and recreational. Everybody knows about fire. We all have a private inner life, and share some concept that we do. In any group of people on Earth there is some economic inequality, food taboos, and mourning of the dead. We all use measures and give gifts. At any given table at lunch conflict is deplored, empathy is felt, and dreams are interpreted. We shouldn't have to understand each other because we're told to; we should understand each other because it's not difficult.

Stepping outside of one's group is a scary thing, but more often than not it seems like a much smaller step in the end than the anticipated leap was. A sense of individual responsibility for the many is what catapulted the early status of this country. Don't deny yourselves each other now.

United we stand, divided we fall.

ANNA FEDER/COLLEGIAN
Tricky delivered two hours of powerful, atmospheric music at Pearl Street this Wednesday.

Tricky performs live at Pearl Street, drenches audience in sonic force

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

TRICKY
Pearl Street
Sept. 15

NORTHAMPTON — Putting on a much better show than last time he came to the area, Tricky put sound ahead of presentation Wednesday night at Pearl Street. What Tricky lacked in stage presence, he more than made up for sonically with a set that enveloped the audience in an ethereal rock/hip-hop soundscape.

Not relying on turntables or samples was one of the more surprising elements of the performance. With a guitar, bass, keyboards and live drums, Tricky and his female vocalist, Martina emerged out of darkness to hard-edged beats and jaded guitars. Tricky's death grip on the microphone resulted in several broken microstands during the course of the show.

Awash in heavily saturated and extremely dim light, the moody tone of the evening was set. The performers did not have much to offer visually most of the time you couldn't even see their faces, but that didn't matter much. There was not much to look at onstage anyway, unless Martina was singing. Tricky's violent convulsing while he rapped put emphasis on the aggressiveness of some songs, but for the most part Tricky spent most of the set turned away from the crowd, taking out all his aggression on the microphones.

"Overcome," was one song memorably performed, as were "Christiansands," "Tricky Kid," "Black Steel," and "Abbaon Fat Track." The set went smoothly, consisting mostly of material from his three LPs, Maxinquaye, Pre-Millennium Tension, and Angels With Dirty Faces. Tricky's set lasted nearly two hours with no encore.

DJ Genacide II (a.k.a. Kris Bonez) is touring with Tricky in support of his new album Id Unite, which will be in stores next week.

Overall, seeing Tricky perform live did not really mean very much. It was hearing Tricky perform live that made the show worthwhile. Without the technical difficulties that plagued his last visit to Pearl Street, Tricky's moody music, while grating at times, managed to be very pleasing to the ear.

The Big E: a month of music, rides, and beer

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

Want to become a "Certified Beer Master," see some quality entertainment, fulfill your childhood dreams by meeting Ronald McDonald or watch chicks hatch at the Farm-A-Rama Exhibit? Then head to the Big E now through Oct. 3 at the Eastern States Exposition in West Springfield. The Big E, now in its 78th year, offers a diverse line-up of activities, performances and rides during its month-long residency.

The Budweiser Beer School offers a detailed three-dimensional replica of the brewing process and a computerized state of the art audio/visual system. Beer Master classes begin at 10 a.m. and are 30 minutes long. New classes begin every hour and 15 minutes. Individuals who graduate will receive a "Certified Beer Master" certificate and have an opportunity to sample a variety of beers.

After becoming a "Certified Beer Master," head to the Toyota Hollywood Stunt Show that offers a thrilling, 70-minute performance of high-speed chases, misses and jumping. In years past they even launched a car out of a canon.

Plenty of food will be offered, providing a sampling of the best foods of each New England state. Speaking of food, the Big E also offers the Land O' Lakes Butter Best Cookie Contest, Fleischmann's Yeast Best-Ever Bread Competition, National Best SPAM Recipe Contest and the Pillsbury Refrigerated P... Tommy Hilfiger takes marketing to new heights

By Robin Givhan
The Washington Post

NEW YORK – Tommy Hilfiger must be stopped.

Judging from the extravaganza he mounted at Madison Square Garden, his ego is fast approaching the size of his own blimp.

The marketer extraordinaire presented a multimedia event that may have set a new standard for hubris in the fashion industry, and rest assured there already had been measurements registering off the charts. Hilfiger enlisted the aid of the band Bush to perform as models traipsed around the catwalk in red, white and blue cowboy boots adorned with the words "Tommy Rocks." In case anyone missed the message, it was repeated on the backs of Western-style jackets and on vanity belt buckles the size of Hilfiger's head.

Certainly Hilfiger is no stranger to logo-driven fashion. Nor is he alone in enjoying the sight of his own name emblazoned on someone's back. But Tuesday's show seemed garishly excessive, not simply because of the size of the nameplates but because the show prattled on self-indulgently about how fabulous the man — not the clothes — really is.

Perhaps if Hilfiger had shown clothes that department stores might actually sell, the whole circus wouldn't have reeked of a vanity event. The clothes — Western-inspired leather separates, micro-miniskirts and suits — will turn up almost exclusively in Hilfiger's Beverly Hills flagship store. They will undoubtedly be prominently featured in music videos. But they will not make it much beyond that.

"Judging Amy" brings wit, to CBS

By Karin Lipson
Newsday

Some two or three years ago, actress Amy Brenneman decided to make a videotape for her mother as a birthday present. As part of the project, she spent a few days at her mother's workplace, talking to colleagues and friends who shared their reminiscences of Brenneman's mother for her tape.

Since Brenneman's mother is Connecticut Superior Court Judge Frederica S. Brenneman, going to Mom's office meant hanging out in a branch of the Hartford Superior Court. And since Frederica Brenneman is, specifically, a juvenile-court judge, what her daughter found, she recalls, "was this very unique group of professionals – social workers, probation officers, all in the same courthouse and working on behalf of children."

Something clicked. With that birthday tape an idea was born that has become "Judging Amy," the new one-hour CBS dramatic series starring – you guessed it – Amy Brenneman, and inspired by the life and times of Judge Frederica S. Brenneman.

In "Judging Amy," which debuts in a special time slot Sunday at 8 p.m. (it moves to its regular Tuesday time period Sept. 21 at 10 p.m.), Brenneman portrays Amy Gray, newly separated, newly a single mom, and very newly juvenile-court judge in, yes, Hartford, Conn.

The show also features Tyne Daly as Amy Gray's lovingly acerbic mother, Maxine. A retired social worker, Maxine is frequently at loggerheads with her slightly shell-shocked daughter, a Harvard-educated refugee from New York who has moved with her 6-year-old daughter back to the family home in Hartford. As she starts her life over, Amy finds that her background in corporate law has clearly been less-than-ideal training for her new career.

What makes a good judge, the rookie "Honorable Amy Madison Gray" asks her mother in the show's first episode?

"Pee before you take the bench. Don't wear perfume. And always make sure there's no food on your teeth," replies the courtroom-savvy Maxine.

That Judge Amy is soon dealing with a case of child neglect is no coincidence. Child neglect "is really her specialty," Brenneman says of her own mother's work in the juvenile court system. Now semi-retired, Judge Brenneman still frequently sits on the bench ("like a substitute judge," says her daughter) and serves as a consultant to the show.

Having grown up hearing about juvenile law, "I was interested in using that for a series: it's a branch of law I had never seen on TV," says Amy Brenneman (perhaps best known for her role as a police officer in the early days of "NYPD Blue"). "And it's a different style of courtroom: there's no jury, and the judge gets to participate very freely with everybody in the courtroom."

In fact, the show's Judge Amy, confronted on her first day in court with an alphabet soup of social-welfare agency abbreviations, does directly confront members of the court on their predilection for bureaucratic sludge: "I'd like to talk to DCF (Department of Children and Families) about the OTC (order of temporary custody) and to the D-A-D," she barks.

The what?

"The Dad," she explains, only slightly apologetic at her little joke.

As a child, says Brenneman, she didn't visit her mother's courtroom all that frequently. But "in the last four or five years, I see her more in court, and it blows me away, because all the very best of her comes out."

"My mother's an extraordinary person. The intelligence, the compassion and the no-nonsense cutting through the bureaucracy – she's the smartest person in the room!"

Based on her credentials, Judge Brenneman (who has declined to give interviews about the show) would seem always to have been the smartest person in the room- or was sitting in an exceptionally smart room. A 1947 magna cum laude graduate of Radcliffe College, she was part of Harvard Law School's first class of women graduates in 1953. (Amy Brenneman carried on the family tradition by graduating from Harvard University in 1987.) Frederica Brenneman was also, says her daughter, "the second woman to be put on the bench in Connecticut, in 1967. Pretty late, huh?" she notes, for women to have stormed that particular male bastion.

When she was first appointed to the bench, her mother "didn't know anything at all about being in the courtroom," says Brenneman. "She had to learn on the fly, by asking questions. And I wanted that to appear in the first episode."

The person she credits with "really nailing" Judge Amy's initial nervousness, and much else, is Barbara Hall, an executive producer and the chief writer on the show.

In fact, Amy Gray's status as a newly separated woman coping with a small child reflects not the life of Frederica Brenneman – who met her husband, an environmental lawyer, in Harvard Law School and has been married for 48 years – but that of Barbara Hall.

"When I was exactly the age of the character, 34, I got divorced and had a little girl this little girl's age," says Hall. Moving to another city like Judge Amy, "I just blew my life up, in a way, and started over."

Eileen Ivers brings traditional and contemporary Irish music to the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Thursday, October 7th at 7:30. She will appear with Maura O'Connell, a Pioneer Valley favorite.

New Spin on Women's Issues

Kathleen Rolls

Back from obscurity is the Women's Issues page. Since I am one of one on staff right now, you can take this as a classified if you are interested in getting your feet wet in journalism or announcing your ideas on gender issues to a larger audience.

If you don't think you have the spin on women's issues or feel that all genders are equal, think again the next time you yell to your friends, "Hey guys," even if some or all are female.

So you ask yourself: Why should I care about this page? For one, maybe you are a male and feel that enough is enough with women's liberation. That was better suited for the sixties, and many women have careers now, for crying out loud!

Or you're a young woman, in college, preparing for a bright career. You have a boyfriend who totally respects you and you have never heard a single whistle as you walk by a construction site.

Did you know women still make only 70 cents to a man's dollar? When was the last time you saw a commercial for domestic abuse in which the male was being harassed or beaten?

Why are young women paired up with older, middle-aged men in movies? Take Runaway Bride, for instance. Why does Julia Roberts the flouncy, younger woman need the silver-haired Richard Gere to straighten up her act?

Even today, more women than men are forced to make difficult decisions about childcare while balancing the brunt of household duties. Many people fail to realize that women join the ranks of blacks and homosexuals as minorities. So it is up to us, the next generation of females and males, to keep pushing the button for a more equal society.

While there is not one kind of female or male, keep in mind you are one of 24,000 who attend UMass. What makes UMass such a great university is the people who shape it with their opinions and energy. And there's always room for more.

In an effort to involve more than just a smattering of women and the Women's Studies Dept., we will also run one section of the page called "Battle of the Sexes" in which everyday topics will be debated by one or more members of both sexes.

I ask that you jog your brain and let me know what your perspective is. When a woman dresses provocatively. You can email me at krills@student.umass.edu or drop off your angle at the Collegian at 113 Campus Center Basement.

Here it is, an invitation for anyone on campus who wants to voice their opinion or just wants to see their name in the Collegian. Welcome. Because women's issues involve men too.

For those of you who want to tell us your story, whether it is a personal experience or a worldwide issue, we also want to hear from you.

Pack in your Barbie obsessions: it's time to love your body

Kathleen Rolls

As the coach of a girls' athletic team at a local high school, I have gladly accepted that my role goes beyond instructing field positions and strategy. Much to my surprise, teaching my team how to drop back into a diagonal defense or improve their fundamentals has taken from my top priorities. In fact, they now run much simpler than that. Life issues like eating and monitoring dieting have surfaced as far more important. And unlike Houston Rocket forward Charles Barkley, I want to set a good example for the girls on my team.

Many assume that because they are athletes, they can feel free to eat what they want because of all the calories they burn everyday. But it's more accurate to say that because these girls are athletes, they are more driven by their discipline for what is considered perfection in every facet of their lives. And for young American girls and women, that includes near zero percent body fat.

At the very first practice, the other coach and I lectured the girls on eating enough to accommodate their increase in activity.

"If you are hungry at lunch, eat a deli sandwich if that's what you want. Have a snack before or after dinner if you need to," we told them.

Yet the first day of practice, one girl couldn't complete the running because she hadn't eaten lunch. She spent the second half of practice eating her sandwich. Many days somebody tells me that they didn't feel like having breakfast or didn't have time to make lunch. It's not their fault that food, a necessity to live, isn't a priority. For many females, skipping a meal is considered progress or an achievement.

Many books and movies have documented the American female's struggle to control weight and understand body shapes. Gymnasts and ice skaters are among the highest percentage of athletes to struggle with eating disorders, according to one of the many books on the subject, Little Girls in Pretty Boxes.

It is a far cry from the majority of males. Their eating patterns depend on 1) their budget and 2) how much time they have. For females, however, walking around and ogling the body shapes of their peers is an everyday habit. Think about it: How times have you wished for a tighter, more defined figure? After you eat ice cream or a big dinner, do the first words out of your mouth refer to how full you feel and how disgusted you are with yourself because of the amount you ate? You are certainly not alone. Let's face it, getting ready for "swimsuit shape" has become an annual sound-off for women following the winter.

The waif-like model trend has spread beyond the U.S., where young girls and women dieters have increased and the number of eating disorders has exploded in recent years.

National leaders and organizations have been taking the necessary steps to stop the national campaign that supports everyone trying to become supermodels. Deep down, we all know that we come in different shapes and sizes. It is unfair that males can be solidly built and considered to be ideal, while the other half starves itself or exercises to excessiveness.

Next Wednesday is the second annual Love Your Body Day, endorsed by the National Organization for Women (NOW). It will be a national day of action to "speak out against images of women that are offensive, harmful, dangerous and disrespectful."

Across the country, activists will be picketing, holding rallies, and hosting discussions in classrooms and house parties to help dispel the myth that one body type is considered ideal for every person.

Love Your Body Day was promoted this summer at the Lilith Fair, when thousands signed petitions to say "Enough!" to impossible "beauty" standards.

"The harmful and negative images of women can be damaging to our sense of self worth and keep us focused on our body parts rather than on our whole selves. These images distract women from pursuing full equality. Through this campaign we will take the power to control our own images and lives," NOW President Patricia Ireland said.

So take a break on Wednesday. Don't agonize in front of the mirror until you miss your bus. Don't worry if you can't count each and every rib, or your arms are not as taut as you would like them to be. Head to the bike trail and have a leisurely Rollerblade with your friends, or just hang out. But forget about the sundae you ate over the weekend.

Tennis pro Stevenson on top in spite of secret pop

By Sharon Waxman
The Washington Post

NEW HAVEN, Conn. - When Alexandra Stevenson was 6 months old, her mother took her to a swimming specialist, who threw her in a pool. By 12 months she was swimming several feet through the water. At 18 months she was doing multiple flips underwater, without coming up for a breath. At 2 she was competing in local races in her hometown of La Jolla, Calif.

That was before preschool. By the time she got to first grade, Stevenson was doing gymnastics, ballet, and ice-skating. A couple of years later she was playing soccer, too. And from the start, tennis. Always tennis. She had a racket at 3 1/2. By age 9 she was taking lessons twice a week.

"It wasn't intensive," insists her mother, Samantha, watching her daughter hammer backhands across the court to her coach, Craig Kardon. "All my friends were doing the same thing. It was the '80s. We were power moms. We were making sure our kids were brilliant in the classroom and brilliant in the field."

Except that Alexandra Stevenson wasn't like all the kids growing up in La Jolla, a wealthy, conservative, white enclave of Southern California. She was a biracial child being raised by a white mother. She had no father at home. She wasn't wealthy.

And Stevenson hasn't turned out like all the other kids either. The 6-foot-1 18 year-old played in the U.S. Open, her first Grand Slam tournament since she stunned the tennis world by blasting her way to the semifinals at Wimbledon - after having to play several matches just to qualify for the tournament. She was the first female qualifier to get so far at Wimbledon.

But a bigger bombshell had come earlier that week: The Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel broke the news that Stevenson was the unacknowledged daughter of legendary basketball player Julius "Dr. J." Erving, who is married and has four other children. After first denying the story, Erving acknowledged his paternity, stemming from a relationship he had had with Stevenson's mother, a sports journalist, in the 1970s. He said he had supported his daughter financially over the years and had seen her once. Then he went back to his life.

Is it fair? After all the hard work? It was again, on television, as the newscaster announced Stevenson's first-round loss in the New Haven Pilot Pen tournament - "Dr. J's daughter" had been eliminated. Like a sudden curse. Whose business it is anyway?

"I hate it," she says hotly over lunch, after practice and a long discussion about her childhood, her ambitions and her life since joining the pro tour in June. "I'm not his daughter. I'm Sam's daughter," She sighs. "Some stupid guard shouted at me.

"Dr. J!' I wanted to punch him." She never would, of course; Stevenson is far too poised, far too... nice.

"But you'll get that," she concludes. "I don't like it. I just ignore it. I just have to not listen."

From the start, Samantha made no secret of her ambitions for her child. In 1986, when Alexandra was 5, she wrote an article for World Tennis magazine about motherhood: "Even before she picked up a tennis racket, I saw myself at Centre Court, Wimbledon, clapping for my daughter." And in 1987 in the same magazine, she hinted that Alexandra's heredity might hold greatness. "What makes a champion?" she wrote. "Red Smith (a former New York Times sports columnist) once told me it's in the blood. I agree. A world-class athlete is born with the ability to be great. Alexandra has it. You do know if your child's got it."

Glass ceiling? Try outerspace instead;

UMass alumnus Coleman keeps the pace in space

Kathleen Rolls

On July 23, 1999, United States Air Force Lieutenant Colonel and NASA Astronaut Eileen Marie Collins became the first woman to command a mission in space when she led Space Shuttle Columbia on a 5-day mission from Kennedy Space Center.

Joining Collins on Space Shuttle Mission STS-93 was UMass alumnus Catherine G. "Cady" Coleman, who received her doctorate in polymer science and engineering from UMass in 1991.

Coleman, also a Lt. Col. in the Air Force and NASA astronaut, returned as a mission specialist in July. She was a mission specialist in her first flight in October 1995 when she circled the Earth 256 times, covering over 6 million miles over a period of 15 days.

At the 1996 dedication of the Conte National Center for Polymer Research, Coleman received an honorary doctoral degree. Considered an outspoken member of the UMass community, she carried a UMass banner aboard one of her flights which is now displayed in the Conte Center.

Said National Organization of Women (NOW) President Patricia Ireland, who was in attendance for the liftoff, "When Eileen Collins lifts off, she will not only break through the earth's atmosphere, she will break through the glass-ceiling at NASA."

For Coleman, who shattered endurance and tolerance records during NASA tests, it was a day of sharing with some of her colleagues including Thomas McCarthy, a professor of polymer science and engineering. McCarthy describes Coleman as a worthy candidate for such a mission

"The array of techniques which she learned in graduate school doing chemistry and polymer research make Cady a versatile experimentalist; now she does science in a number of disciplines," he said.

"Cady is a great spokesman for the University, for the polymer science department, for NASA, and a wonderful role model for women in science," said polymer science and engineering department head Richard Farris.

last weekend in three of the four games of the Collegiate Water Polo Association North Division tournament in Amherst.

The offensive attack is expected to be led at the two meter by Fabio Greg Fraser and Matt Moore. Fraser and Moore combined for 23 goals last weekend in the four game sweep. Senior Pat Barnes is also looking to help out, building on a big seven point performance last weekend.

This weekend's competition should be a good indicator of the team's growth and development in the past two weeks. With the bitter taste of defeat smeared on UMass' nearly perfect record, a war is on the Maroon and White's hands more than just a battle. If the underdog Bonnies can strike revenge and defeat St. Francis, the doubts that many followers of the Massachusetts men's water polo community held earlier this season will be laid to rest.

and defensively. DeMarte showed her prodigal prowess in last weekend's Motorola Invitational Tournament, where he Texas native posted backto-back double-doubles.

"I think the biggest thing with Tareen is getting comfortable playing all the way around. She didn't do that last year, so now that she is doing that this year, she has a lot more to think about," Kenny said. "Last year, we played a defensive specialist for us this year we are asking her to be a primary attacker, in addition to playing solid defense and every other aspect of the game. She has a very quick arm swing and once she gets used to playing all-around, she will be getting a lot of double-doubles because she can play good defensive."

The last time Nova invited the Minutemen to its fair, they scored 35 points in the first half and coasted to a 49-28 victory. Boden picked apart the Minuteman defense for five scores early on before resting for most of the second half. The Wildcats are hoping for more of the same come Saturday.

Westbrook was a Minuteman killer last season, scoring all three of Villanova's touchdowns, but the 'Cats won't be without his services this week end. In his place stands junior Desmond Augustin, who compiled 65 yards in last week's victory.

Running back Marcel Shipp was supposed to duke it out with Westbrook in deciding who was the conference's best offensive player but instead with Westbrook's Aug. 2nd injury Shipp will try to build on last week's 145-yard performance, his 13th consecutive 100-yard game.

Tomorrow's matchup is just the beginning for the Minutemen away from McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The defending national champions put themselves to the test against six teams away from home that posted winning records in 1998, including next week when the Minutemen take on Division I-A Pittsburgh in the Bowl.

Ranked just ahead of UMass is Georgia Southern, who knocked off Wofford last weekend, 35-14, this a week after throttling Fayetteville State, 70-0. This week marks the true test for the Cowboys, as last year's defending I-AA champs take on the PAC 10's version of the Cowboys, Oregon State.

Game time is set for 12 p.m. at Villanova Stadium.

After season to forget, Steelers' Stewart out to disprove his skeptics

By Vito Stellino
Baltimore Sun

Kordell Stewart threw 18 interceptions and just 11 touchdown passes last year, lost his last five starts, was benched twice, got into an argument with his coach on the sideline and then appeared to break down in tears.

That's the kind of performance that casts quarterbacks their jobs.

Instead, the Pittsburgh Steelers fired their offensive coordinator and gave Stewart a new $27 million contract extension with an $8.1 million signing bonus that ties him to the team for the next five years. Even Stewart admits he wasn't expecting the Steelers to come to him offering a contract extension after he flamed out last year.

"I won't say surprised, but I didn't expect it to come. It came out of nowhere. As far as the money is concerned, there was no need for extra money. I just want to go and win a Super Bowl and earn it. But they felt they wanted me to be here for a long time. Here I am today having a few extra years under my belt (in Pittsburgh) and I'm glad for that," he said.

The $8.1 million investment was one more sign that the Steelers seem determined to stick with Stewart until he gets it right. It's an old saying that quarterbacks get too much of the credit when things go well and too much of the blame when they don't. In Pittsburgh, Stewart tends to get little of the blame.

"I think it's important we all realize we can't blame 1998 entirely on Kordell," said Tom Donahoe, the director of football operations.

When Steelers Coach Bill Cowher was asked Wednesday why Stewart struggled, he said: "I think our football team struggled. I don't think it was just any one individual. I really don't get involved too much in rehashing last year. Last year was last year. I'd rather just address this year."

If Stewart does recapture the form he had in 1997 in his first year as a starter when he took the team to the AFC title game, the Steelers' backing of Stewart will be a model of a team supporting a young quarterback in tough times.

If he doesn't, the Steelers will be seen as throwing good money after bad.

The Steelers are walking on a high wire with Stewart. They didn't bother to go out and get a first-rate backup for Stewart. They're sticking with shopworn veteran Mike Tomczak behind him. The Steelers will go as far as Stewart takes them.

In an effort to get Stewart back on the right track, the Steelers fired offensive coordinator Ray Sherman, who's now running the Minnesota offense, and hired Kevin Gilbride, who was fired as the San Diego head coach last year and is noted mainly for getting punched on the sideline by Buddy Ryan when they were both Houston assistants.

One Chicago writer said bringing in Gilbride after his San Diego experience to save Stewart was akin to sending "the Lusitania to rescue the Titanic."

Cowher, though, raves about Gilbride, who was allowed to bring in his own offense. Sherman had to keep the the offense they had.

used under former coordinator Chan Gailey, now the Dallas head coach, when he was hired last year.

Explaining why he let Gilbride bring in his offense, Cowher said, "Because he's a proven coordinator. I think that's the bottom line. I think last year the situation was a little bit different because losing Chan Gailey in February didn't give me a whole lot of options to pick from."

The option he picked last year was Sherman, who left Minnesota and wound up being the designated scapegoat for the Steelers' collapse to 7-9 last year. Not surprisingly, Sherman thinks Stewart should take some of the responsibility.

While Cowher declines to revisit last year, he insists Gilbride is the perfect fit with Stewart. Cowher also thinks that Stewart, criticized last year by Tomczak for not working hard enough on the job, is committed to improving.

"He's been very receptive. He turned down going to the Quarterback Challenge and a number of golf opportunities and stayed around here and spent a lot of hours with Kevin when nobody else was in this building. He was very much committed to doing what it took to turn around from the disappointment we all felt a year ago," Cowher said.

Stewart and Cowher both deny this is a make-or-break year for Stewart, but it's up to Stewart to live up to the confidence the Steelers showed in him in the offseason. Gilbride and Stewart may get their first real test Sunday when they come to Baltimore to face the Ravens.

No Sosa, but little man's epic journey beats out the NY Giants

By Dave Kindred

Two weeks before he was to get married, minor league baseball player Chuck Antczak heard from his girl that she had changed her mind. She had her reasons. He'd be gone on all those road trips, riding buses to scruffy places, and for what? If you put a pencil to the hours and the money, it came out to maybe $5 an hour to play baseball.

"So she gave me the ol' boot," the poor guy said.

The way these things happen, when it rains, it pours. He lost the girl and lost the job, too. That was in 1947. He was out of baseball for the first time since he was 6. Never a phenom, a good college pitcher/outfielder, he hung on in pro ball as a backup catcher. There's no glory in that dust, except for this: It kept the dream alive.

"And when I got back in the game in '98," Antczak said, "I promised myself I was going to have fun."

Which brings us to Chuck Antczak's 77 home runs this summer. He hit them for the Clearwater Phillies of the Class A Florida State League. Unless you're a reader of the little stories in newspaper sports sections, you may not know about the 77 home runs. That's because he hit them all in batting practice. In real games, he hit none.

"If the single hardest thing in sports is hitting a baseball, the single hardest thing to do when you hit a baseball is to hit it out of the ballpark," Antczak said. And who would know that better than a guy who hits 77 dingers at 5 o'clock but can't go yard even once when real pitchers start throwing curves?

We introduce Chuck Antczak as preamble to one more examination of the mighty work being done by Sammy Sosa and Mark McGwire. In this summer of Taters Tremendous, they again have made this hard thing look easy.

Baseballs are winding up in the next time zone. Cal Ripken Jr.'s 400th home run broke a fan's nose. Still, if major league baseball created a ticket-selling conspiracy to make everyone a power hitter, wouldn't there be a stampede to 60 home runs? There isn't. Only two men are on this march. In fact, Sosa and McGwire are so good at what they do that they have separated themselves not only from today's pack but from history.

Midway through this summer, our hero Chuck Antczak realized he could put up what he calls "McGwire-ish numbers." In his first minor league season (1994), he hit a home run off Jose Jimenez, who pitched one of the big-league's three no-hitters this season. "He had a nasty just nasty, slider, and when I hit it, guys were saying, 'Man, you're gonna rake.'"

Antczak sighs. "Five years later, that's still my only professional home run."

But a boy can have baseball fun a hundred ways. Every time Antczak hit one out in batting practice this summer, he marked a line on his helmet. When the lines added up to 25, he had an idea. Why not go for the record? Why not hit 71?

Clearwater Manager Bill Dancy and coaches Darold Knowles and Tony Scott "did their best to hit my bat," Antczak says.

"Finally, we got past 61. Who hit 61. Gehrig?" Roger Maris. "Oh, past Maris, past Sosa's 66. But we were running late in the season to get to McGwire, and it got kinda anxious."

To celebrate his 71st BP home run on the last weekend of his team's regular season, Chuck Antczak circled the bases, slapping high-fives with his teammates and coaches. Then he fashioned a trophy to give to the coach, Knowles, who threw the historic pitch. The trophy was a little cardboard box with a ball of adhesive tape perched atop it.

From 71 he flew to 77, which sounds like a good number until you hear Antczak say, "Hey, McGwire's probably got 7,000 BP home runs. What he and Sosa do is unbelievable. Every act but they see 90 mph fastballs, nasty sliders, the ball cutting and diving, and they stand there like nothing's going on. They're so special."

UM men's cross-country to travel north for quad-meet

By Andrea Crane
Collegian Staff

Now that the first meet jitters are behind them, the Massachusetts men's cross country team is hoping to improve on its opening fifth place finish at Boston when they travel to Burlington, VT this Saturday, September 18th for a quad meet. They will race head to head against Boston University, the University of Maine, and the host University of Vermont.

Last Friday, UMass finished up behind tough competitors Boston College, Iona, the University of New Hampshire and the University of Connecticut. This week the team is working hard to improve its physical and mental preparation. On Saturday the team will try to shorten the gap between its top times and those of its opponents.

Gaining confidence and speed, the runners will follow the lead of senior Matt Ely, who finished first for the Minutemen and 17th overall in Boston. Ely crossed the finish line of the five-mile course in a time of 26:35. The UMass roster is composed of mostly sophomores, who are continuing to improve and work up to their top times.

The Maroon and White will need to watch out for Boston University's Frederik Naalsund. In the school's opening meet at the Dartmouth Invitational this past Saturday, Naalsund bested the entire field with an impressive time of 24:59, an outstanding 32 seconds ahead of the next competitor. Boston University tied Keene State for second place as host Dartmouth came out on top.

The University of Maine will begin its season on Saturday. Last year the Black Bears finished sixth in the America East Conference. The team brings a lot of experience to the table, with twelve returning athletes from last fall.

On the other hand, the Vermont Catamounts are training hard and preparing their young athletes for the college level meets. In the team's season opener this weekend, seven freshmen will take to the course with only six veterans to lead the way.

UMass coach Ken O'Brien hopes that with motivation and strong physical conditioning, two or three of his runners will gain some confidence and break away from the pack to close the gap between them and the other team's top competitors. Over the next couple weeks of practicing and preparation, O'Brien looks forward to working his runners up to the top times of the race. If the team can focus in and work hard, there is a good chance for success.

For the upcoming race, it appears that UMass will have to adjust to the same rainy weather conditions as they did last Friday. The meet will take place at Archie Post Field in Burlington, VT.

Following the meet, the Minutemen will have two weeks off to prepare for the Meet of Champions, which will take place Oct. 2nd at Van Cortlandtt Park in Bronx, N.Y.

Women's XC hopes for repeat in New England school battle

By Bryan Smith and Trisha Turcotte
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow the Massachusetts women's cross country team will travel to the University of Vermont for a quad meet with the Terriers of Boston University, the Blue Devils of Central Connecticut State University, and the host Catamounts.

UMass is coming off an impressive opening meet in which they placed second out of four teams. The Minutewomen faced some tough competition in their first meet of the season, falling just off the pace of nationally ranked Boston College.

Coach Julie LaFreniere was "very pleased with the performances [of her athletes]." Last week's course was flat, but this week the Maroon and White not only face tough regional competition, but also a course that is downhill for the first mile and uphill in the third. A course with these conditions should create a fast first mile and a slower final leg.

UMass is looking for some solid performances from their senior leaders Sally Hirsch, who finished in seventh place, Nicole Way, who placed eighth, and sophomore Kristin Cisowski who finished ninth.

LaFreniere said, "Was is running better than ever." This is great praise, being that Way has been one of the Minutewomen's top performers over the last three seasons. Senior Monica Elmore is also expected to have a great performance. According to coach LaFreniere, "Monica Elmore is ready to go [this year]. She had a great summer."

LaFreniere is looking for strong performances from Lizzie Shoptick, who ran with UMass' lead pack last week but fell out in the final mile. Freshman Elizabeth Mitchell, from Aspen, CO, is still adjusting to the running conditions of the Northeast. Once she adjusts, she is sure to be an excellent runner.

Sophomore Katherine Blais, junior Melissa Henderson and senior tri-captain Sharon Elkerson will also be looked upon for solid leadership in this week's meet.

"BU is always strong," said LaFreniere. The Terriers finished second last week in a meet at Dartmouth College. Despite the defeat, BU's Lauren Matthews had a late surge to win the individual competition. To go along with her first place finish, BU also placed Ann Kovalsky third and Michaela Thompson eighth. Kathryn Ireland also had a strong day, finishing just outside the top ten. LaFreniere also said, "You never know what BU is going to do [this year, as] runners out[, they brought in] good freshmen and this may be a good opportunity to get their feet wet."

The Blue Devils are coming off an impressive win in the CCSU Women's Cross Country Invitational. In the top ten they had four runners place. Heather Gardiner placed second, senior Stephani Johnson placed fifth, freshman Kim Crowley placed eighth, and sophomore Kimberly Heiligman placed ninth.

Although this will be the first race for the Catamounts, don't expect them to disappoint their home crowd.

The strength of the Minutewomen is pack running. This week's goal is to keep just as many of their runners in the lead group as their opponents. They are going to try to stay as close as possible. According to LaFreniere, "I expect to see some good from our athletes."

Sallie Mae funds high schools for high grades; student-athletes at center stage

By Michael Wilbon
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Once in a while somebody comes up with an idea that makes so much sense it ought to be mandatory everywhere, for everybody. Sallie Mae, the nation's largest source of funding for educational loans, did so recently when it launched the Sallie Mae Cup, a new athletic/academic competition for high school students.

Here's how it works: At the end of each academic year, a school will compute the average winning percentage of its top eight sports programs (girls and boys), and the grade point averages of all the students who competed in those sports. Schools will then be ranked, with GPAs counting for 60 percent of the standings and winning percentages 40 percent. The winning high school will receive an engraved cup from Sallie Mae, plus $25,000 in college scholarship money.

It's simple incentive-based, and hopefully will reinforce the notion in high school locker rooms that sports and academics can and should go hand-in-hand. "We hope we've come up with something that rewards the right things," Paul Carey, a Sallie Mae executive vice-president, said the other day.

Perhaps most important around here is that every high school in the greater D.C. metropolitan area (there are about 230) will be eligible. Even small schools can compete; Sallie Mae will allow schools that don't have eight varsity sports to use six instead. One day, in a best-case scenario, schools all over the country will have a chance to compete, locally, for a Sallie Mae Cup. Right now, though, D.C. is fortunate to get in on the ground floor, along with Kansas City and Philadelphia.

It's an idea that took root only five months ago. After joining several local business leaders to help salvage a city high school basketball championship, several Sallie Mae executives with extensive help from D.C.-based sports management firm Pro Serv) decided to take their involvement and commitment to high school sports a step further. It's a huge step as it turns out. More than 600 schools will compete nationally for scholarship money to be awarded in June of 2000, once all the athletic competition and schoolwork is completed. "It's exceeded every expectation," Carey said. "We simply didn't imagine this."

In Kansas, Sallie Mae requested and received the help of Danny Manning, who attended the University of Kansas in Lawrence. In Philly, Sallie Mae enlisted the NBA's Malik Rose (San Antonio Spurs) and the WNBA's Dawn Staley (Charlotte Sting) who both went to high school there. In the D.C. area, U.S. gold medalist and World Cup soccer champion Mia Hamm returned to her high school, Lake Braddock in Northern Virginia, to introduce the program.

Jets should take "Q" from other NY'ers D

By Shaun Powell
Newsday

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. – In a few days the Jets will ask Rick Mirer for help, and they might eventually turn to Ray Lucas, when they ought to be consulting the true experts at surviving nicely without a proven quarterback: The Giants.

They haven't had one in years.

And he's still missing, according to Sunday's game in Tampa.

In 1997 the Giants won a division title, then managed eight wins last year, then score d a pair of TDs that beat the Buccaneers in this year's opener, all with mostly minimal assistance from the most important player on the field.

They did it with defense, a philosophy the Jets must borrow in order to survive Vinny Testaverde's ruptured Achilles and at least make the playoffs.

The Jets should listen to Giants linebacker Jessie Armstead. He's a veteran at this. Only in Phil Simms' final year, his rookie year, has he been blessed with a playmaking quarterback. In a sensational Giants career that goes back seven seasons, he has never once used that as an excuse.

"We know who wins games," Armstead said Wednesday. "Defense does."

Defense carried the Giants once again when they opened a new season, only to see old problems. Their running game was three yards and a cloud of doubt. Kent Graham was a combination of Dave Brown and Danny Kanell, the two previous QBs the Giants thought they'd never see again. Receivers couldn't break open. The offense couldn't score.

"I don't feel like we played real well," said Coach Jim Fassel, using a line heard many times before.

Even on his offense's worst days, like Sunday when it squeezed four first downs and failed to cross midfield, Fassel knows he's still in the game because the defense hardly ever lets him down. Armstead and crew came through with a beauty by making Trent Dilfer's afternoon more miserable than Graham's and turning a certain defeat into a brow-wiping victory.

The defense scored on fumble and interception returns and put the offense to shame, which wasn't too difficult.

But this is old news. The defense hailed the offense out so many times over recent years that Kanell used to apologize to Armstead after games. Considering the playing time logged, the injuries of last year and the heavy responsibility, you could argue that the Giants have had the NFL's best defense over the last few years.

The opener was further evidence.

"That game reminded me of 1997 when we were hungry and healthy," safety Sam Garnes said.

This is supposed to be the year the offense heads to catch up, yet the Giants will be anything but balanced. Gary Brown still has a lame knee and who knows if there are another 1,000 yards in those legs. Sean Bennett is a rookie. LeShon Johnson a former canvas painter and J.K. Barbee a third-down back. The running game must be filled by committee in Brown's absence, and those situations almost never work.

That makes it tough on Graham, who prospered last season only when he had a productive and healthy running back to take some heat. Without the pressure of a back who frightens anyone, there might be more Tampa Bay bombs from Graham.

Even healthy, the offense simply can't match the defense in personnel. There are no budding stars, no proven Pro Bowlers, nobody to make highlight tapes like Hilliard or Amani Toomer goes deep. That's the challenge once again for Armstead and Michael Strahan and the rest is to keep the score low and then bleed it out.

Armstead remains optimistic, anyway. The game who stopped short of issuing an ultimatum to the offense, firing the preseason wouldn't blow up in their faces again.

"I saw it as a bad day," Armstead said. "That's how I choose to look at Sunday. A bad day."

But what if more "bad days" are ahead?

Armstead paused.

"Well," he said, a little wearily, "I'll just have to take care of our business."

Armstead said he doesn't anticipate any arguments towards the offense from the defense, which in the past would point more fingers than a traffic cop. We'll see if that lasts beyond Sunday, if Graham gets off to a fast start on the same Redskins who allowed to Comp to travel 341 yards last week.

Death by Vinny not in schedule for Parcells; QB situation still up in air

By Steve Jacobson
Newsday

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. – This is the time for Amos Alonzo Stagg Tombardi Parcells to impose his will and wisdom and lift the lets out of the terrible shock of their opening game. That's what a great coach would do.

And don't believe what the newspapers are saying. They're saying... well you know what they're saying.

"Why do I feel I'm in a damn funeral?" the great coach blurted Wednesday after hearing all the questions mourning the loss of Vinny Testaverde. "It's not a funeral."

It was a soft-toned media session Wednesday as the lets went back to work. It was not the time to bristle. So he was going to try to run this week's practice as close to routine as he could. He recited the roster moves and the list of the fallen and said just move the pylons and move on. "I see the Buffalo Bills," Parcell said. "That's all I see now."

Maybe he is shaken as they are, however the emotions are tempered by age and experience. He certainly wasn't going to betray that to the media or through them to the players. No weeping allowed here. It's not just football; that's life, Parcells said.

Sure, he'd been through this before. He cited losing five Pro Bowl Giants on route to the 86 Super Bowl, but he didn't lose the quarterback. When he did lose Phil Simms on route to the 91 Super Bowl, they were already 10-1 and Jeff Hosteller already had time in the system to prepare himself to step in.

Bill Parcells doesn't have to prove himself. Wayne Chrebet, the doughty receiver, said, propping up his point of view on something more emotional than the crutches holding up his broken foot. Of course Parcells has proved his coaching mastery over the last 15 years. The point is, this is the time to demonstrate it.

In Testaverde they had the happy-ending quarterback sanked away when they were feeling he'd lead them to greatness. Now the ball is in the hands of Rick Mirer who didn't make it at other places. They don't know him and he doesn't know them. And the wise coach really makes it sound that he'd really like to have Ray Lucas fire at the position, if only he wasn't so inexperienced. Remember how Parcells, when he was the resident genius of the Giants, loved Simms' fire.

"Both Rick and Ray, I'm trying to find out exactly what they can do well," Parcells said.

And how do they handle the timing with the receivers? Testaverde threw the ball over the top and delivered it before receivers had made their moves. Mirer, they don't know.

Parcells and Testaverde[illegible] and Barb Parcells took a different track in preparation. Testaverde: "Right now I'm concentrating on concussion. Rick: They did tell Mirer said he [illegible] who knows.

It is not going to be [illegible] will simplify things. He was no dud that there with Seattle. Early in his time with Dave Wannstedt in New England, Parcells had some fun and found the quarterback [illegible] after one game in which he completed [illegible] gun attempts.

Mirer in terms of [illegible] through the locker room, the [illegible] more like the second guy on the whole deal. Think how [illegible] better than [illegible] terrible [illegible] Mirer said.

What does Mirer [illegible] what position? He replied [illegible] Notre Dame as a [illegible] to crowds and [illegible] Randall Cunningham and Doug Flutie, all successful [illegible] last season, while [illegible] but none of them had [illegible] Mirer clarify [illegible]

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Things aren't likely to be what they seem at all times today, and you must have the wherewithal to discern fact from fiction when it counts.
Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You can avoid a domestic hassle simply by remaining flexible and willing to compromise. Someone may approach you with a surprising offer during the evening hours.
Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You must be willing to do things for the sake of doing them today, and get your mind off of any possible rewards – at least for the time being.
Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You must remain calm today, despite any attempts others may make to keep you off-balance. How you acquit yourself now will be quite telling.
Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 10) – You should be able to progress according to plan today so long as you don't get yourself into something of a bureaucratic tangle.
Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You'll have an important impact on family members throughout the day. You can be sure that they'll want you to play an active role all day long.
Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) – You'll receive a surprise from a friend or loved one today which may ultimately change your life in a profound and permanent manner. Say "yes!"
Aries (March 20-April 19) – Despite your efforts, you may not be able to put the crowning touch on a current long-term project just yet. There are still a few loose ends.
Taurus (April 20-May 20) – You'll receive some valuable information today which you must keep available until the time comes to use it. Don't let anyone hurry you now.
Gemini (May 21-June 20) – You've been looking at the world through rose-colored glasses again, and the time has come today to remove them and see things as they really are.
Cancer (June 21-July 22) – A Libra or Taurus native will know just what you need to lift your spirits today. Make yourself available for such special treatment.
Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) – Someone who appears to be a rival is really going to prove quite helpful to you before the day is out. The more people you have on your side the better!

UM football invades Wildcat den in Pennsylvania

QB face-off headlines UM's return to Villanova Stadium

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The consensus after the Massachusetts football team's 34-19 victory over New Hampshire was that the best of the second-ranked Minutemen (1-0 overall, 1-0 Atlantic 10) had yet to be seen. With some unfamiliar faces taking the place of much of last year's foundation, the win over the Wildcats was taken in open arms. This weekend, though, a new set of Cats come center stage looking to avenge last year's loss, and a repeat performance of the UNH win might not be enough.

The Villanova Wildcats return home after a road split. After playing Air Force tough for three quarters, Nova fell apart in the final frame, losing 37-13. A different storyline took place last weekend, as the Wildcats visited Richmond and left with a 35-30 victory over last season's Atlantic 10 Conference champions, all without running back Brian Westbrook, whose torn anterior cruciate ligament will keep him out for all of 1999.

After UM built a 26-point bulge on the Wildcats last season, Villanova came back behind the arm of Chris Boden. "Nova made it interesting, closing to within 10, 36-26, which turned out to be the final margin. Without Westbrook, the pressure on Boden builds. The senior threw for over 300 yards against the Falcons, a Division I-A school. UMass coach Mark Whipple fears that his defense might be in for a long day against the Wildcats playcaller.

"We didn't play very well in our base defense [against UNH]. I think we're a lot better than that. We've got to be this week," Whipple said. "Chris Boden may be one of the greatest quarterbacks to ever play I-AA. You can tell that he is a winner. He's been in some big games so he's not afraid."

Last year in Amherst, the Minutemen chased Boden around the field, rattling the senior and forcing him to throw some ill-advised passes. So far in 1999, the Villanova quarterback has thrown for nearly 600 yards in two games. His longevity in the A-10 was on display against Richmond, as an 11-yard touchdown pass to Murle Sango in the second quarter gave Boden his 59th career connection, a conference record.

The Minuteman defense will need to be on point. For three quarters last weekend, UMass held the most potent offense in the conference, New Hampshire, to just three points. The Wildcat attack came alive in the fourth quarter, compiling 193 yards to make the game close.

"It was a good test for us. We're just happy with the win," Whipple said. "Overall, we made enough plays to get the W."

Most of the yardage came through the air in the final quarter against UNH. For the majority of the game, the Minutemen kept UNH quarterback Ryan Day in check, picking the sophomore headman off four times before he finally broke out of his funk, posting 351 yards passing on the afternoon.

"You give up 493 yards and you can't be happy with that. We didn't take the ball away from New Hampshire and they've got a young quarterback in Day," Whipple said. "He's going to be good down the road, but he's not Chris Boden. If we play like that against Villanova, they are going to have 500, 600 yards on us."

UMass Nation was concerned about what answer the Minutemen would have for the losses they took on offense. It stumbled upon its answer.

To open up 1999, UMass' offense took a quarter to find the groove that it fell in last season. Two minutes into the second quarter, Todd Bankhead found Zullo, his first of four touchdown catches on the afternoon.

"We were a little shaky, a little anxious to get out there," Zullo said. "Then we finally settled down and started executing our plays."

Zullo's outstanding afternoon was good enough for Atlantic 10 Conference Offensive Player of the Week honors. His four-score afternoon tied a conference record last set by Jimmy Moore last season against Connecticut.

Villanova will try to counter with a very young pair of cornerbacks in junior Hezekiah Lewis and sophomore Brian Berko-Boateng. While lacking in experience, Lewis and Berko-Boateng will rely on their speed, fittingly, to take on the conference's quickest receiver. Strong safety Del-onne Kelly leads the A-10 in tackles with 28 through two games. Lewis stands sixth and will likely lineup against Zullo.

Due to an injury to linebacker David Heckard, redshirt freshman Jason McMillion started his first game last week and turned in a great afternoon, registering seven tackles and a sack, which earned him Rookie of the Week in the Atlantic 10. McMillion killed a Richmond drive at the Villanova 3-yard line when he stopped Spiders' quarterback Jhimmie Miles short

UM soccer hosts Classic at Totman

Men's team looks for pair of wins

By Matt Crocker
Collegian Correspondent

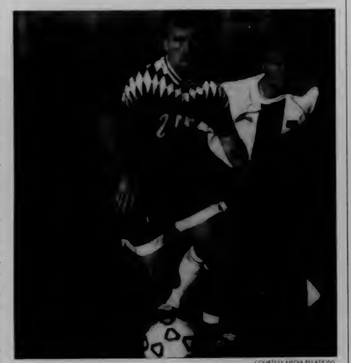
The last time the Massachusetts men's soccer team competed in a tournament on familiar soil was also the last time the Minutemen clinched the Atlantic 10 regular season title. Nearly five years have passed since then, but with this upcoming weekend, the Minutemen will once again host, and play in, the UMass Soccer Classic.

UMass enters the tournament sporting a 3-3 record. The Minutemen recently put together a three-game winning streak, which was broken by Boston University this past Sunday in a 2-0 loss.

The team will try to get back in the win column with the help of leading scorer Adam Black, who comes in with three goals and three assists to his credit. Black is a returning senior this season and an All American candidate.

The net protection of team captain and goalkeeper Todd Fowler, who has totaled 21 saves in four appearances, will help to keep UMass in the tournament defensively. A three-time letter winner, Fowler has been the starting goalkeeper for the Minutemen for the past two seasons and entered the season 10th all-time in career goals-against at UMass.

The Minutemen's competition in the tournament this weekend consists of the University of Hartford, Siena College, and No.16 University of Washington. Of the three opposing tournament teams, UMass has only yet to play Washington, but has defeated both Hartford and Siena in previous meetings.



The University of Hartford comes to UMass with a 1-3 record. UH is entering the tournament while on a two-game losing streak, with one of those losses coming from the Minutemen last week in an overtime game. The Minutemen prevailed 1-0 when Todd Baron scored the winning goal three minutes into the extra set.

In seven meetings with Siena, UMass has racked up a rather impressive record of 5-0-2. Their last meeting took place last season, when the teams deadlocked in a 0-0 tie. Siena returns to Amherst with 1-2 record after losing to Central Connecticut last Wednesday.

The only new competition for UMass this weekend comes from Washington. The Huskies have a solid team and have consistently appeared in the NCAA Tournament since '95, finishing at the top of the Mountain Pacific Sports Federation last season. Washington has come cross-country on a seven game road trip to play in this year's Soccer Classic. With a record of 3-1-1, the Huskies enter the tournament ranked 16th in the nation, suffering their only defeat last Friday at the hands of Southern Methodist University. Wes Hart, a 1999 Herman Trophy finalist and Husky school record holder, and Rees Bettinger, with 27 career goals and 14 career assists, lead Washington into the tournament weekend.

The adversaries that come into Amherst this weekend will be ample warm-ups for the Atlantic 10 season, which kicks off next weekend when UMass travels to Kingston, RI to take on the Rams.

As the UMass Soccer Classic returns, the UMass Minutemen will attempt to repeat history, and once again find themselves in front of the pack of the Atlantic 10 this season. The Minutemen will first take on Hartford on Saturday. Due to the inclement weather, the kickoff time has yet to be announced. They will then continue on to face Washington at 1:30 p.m. on Sunday.

UM volleyball kicks off A-10 conference season

By Seth Szilagyi & James Piehl
Collegian Staff

"I expect us to win the Atlantic Ten Championship," said Xavier head coach Floyd Deaton.

Two major obstacles oppose the optimistic coach: The long bus ride from Ohio to Amherst, fighting a hurricane that bears his name, and another post-season conference hopeful in the Massachusetts volleyball team.

Due to Hurricane Floyd, tonight's match against Dayton and Saturday's versus Xavier have been pushed back, giving the Minutewomen an extra day to prepare for their two conference opponents.

"You can blame Xavier coach Floyd for the storm," said UM Coach Bonnie Kenny. "We're prepared to play today or tomorrow. This is a big weekend. These are big conference matches and it gives us more time to prepare."

On Sunday, the Minutewomen will host Xavier University at 4pm in Curry Hicks Cage. Xavier boasts a record of 7-2 on the season and last year's rookie of the year, Sara Bachus. The Musketeers come in on a two match winning streak, led by sophomore Jill Hampton's season average of 3.92 kills per game and senior Beth Osterday's 3.92 digs per game. UMass will have to make sure they play good backcourt defense and try to contain a great balanced attack, according to Kenny. However, UMass leads the all-time series 6-2 and is hoping to pick up another victory.

The Minutewomen will officially open the A-10 season on Saturday, when they host the Dayton Flyers at 7pm in the Cage. Dayton (3-5) will be looking to put the brakes on a four game losing streak. Junior Sierra Ashley's team-leading 4 kills per game and 2.41 digs per game leads the Flyers' attack. UM will also have to keep an eye on junior Carla Muntz, who averages 12.81 assists per game and 2.3 digs per game.

"They are deep. They go three-deep in the middle and four-deep in the outside hitting position. So if somebody is having an off match, they can go to their bench and have somebody come in and not skip a beat," Kenny said. "They have a great setter in Carla Muntz, who knows how to isolate her hitters. She really makes her offense go, which is something we are going to have to focus on in the match."

This weekend might not only see the Minutewomen go 2-0 in the Conference, but also the setting of two milestones. Coach Kenny is two victories away from her 300th career win. Kenny is currently 298-219 in fifteen seasons of coaching and 124-78 since taking over the UMass program in 1993.

Senior Jill Meyers is also poised to put another notch in her already lengthy UMass belt. Meyers comes into the weekend a mere 26 digs shy of the 1,000 kills / 1,000 digs plateau that senior teammate and co-captain Kari Hogancamp reached last weekend. She will be only the fourth player in school history to accomplish this task. Meyers is currently the team leader in kills with 4.04 per game, while Hogancamp is averaging 4.17 digs per game.

UM will be counting on sophomore Juneen DeMarte to continue her streak of strong play, both offensively

Princeton Invitational invites nationally-ranked water polo

By Matty Bencal
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's water polo team travels south this weekend to compete in the Princeton tournament at Princeton University. Challenging our beloved Minutemen are the squads of Princeton, St. Francis University, John Hopkins University, and Boston College.

Last weekend, UMass established itself as a force to be reckoned with by sweeping the Collegiate Water Polo Association North Division tournament in Amherst with four victories.

The Minutemen are ranked 13th in the country by the CWPA with a 7-1 record. This weekend, the Maroon and White hopes to increase its season win total by 4, although that task seems easier said than done.

This weekend's foes present difficult challenges.

"Princeton and St. Francis pose real tough matchups for us" said head coach Rust Yarworth.

Princeton has only played two games this season, so the Minutemen have the advantage of experience on their side. Last season, the Minutemen beat Princeton in a close battle, 7-6. Four of the seven goals have departed with the graduation of Brian Stahl and Gabriel Marrero, who each scored a pair in the victory.

The St. Francis game will be a rematch of the Navy Invitational semifinals game earlier this season, when St. Francis handed the Minutemen their only defeat of the season thus far, a 12-7 loss. The Minutemen smoked the Boston College Eagles last weekend by a final of 22-6.

Leadership for this weekend should come from UM's big guns. UMass will look for a repeat performance from senior Rich Slingluff, who netted two in the loss to St. Francis, including a 2-point goal. It will also look for a momentum carry-over from the victory over the BC Eagles, where USC transfer Mike Foley found his groove. Foley paced the Minutemen with four goals, one shy of his season-high, a five-goal explosion in UMass' victory over Brown.

"Leadership always begins in goal, with Richard Huntley. We're also looking for strong team defense," said Yarworth.

Huntley, a senior and 1998 All-American, had 23 saves

Event closes Student Union

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students wanting to enter the Student Union Friday night faced closed doors when the building was closed to the public as an act of security.

The Black Mass Communications Project (BMCP) hosted their annual Jeans and T-Shirts Dance in the Student Union Ballroom on Friday. According to a flyer released by the Campus Activities Office "In the interest of security Public Safety, Campus Activities, CC Building Services, and BMCP feel that the Student Union should be closed."

Michael Rossettie, president of the UMass Republican Club, and Aaron Saunders, President of University Democrats, discovered the flyer on the Student Government door Friday morning and both said they were alarmed that a Registered Student Organization (RSO) was able to get permission to close a public building.

"If Campus Activities is responsible for shutting down the building, then I would like to know where they got that power," Saunders said.

According to Jose Tolson from Campus Activities, the purpose of the Student Union is to allow students to hold these kinds of events. He said the 600 to 700 students in attendance were looking to have a safe, good time. Tolson said he didn't see any problem with closing a public building for the purpose of security.

"All of the groups were involved in the decision to insure it was a safe event," Tolson said. "The reality is, students of color wanted to have a program and they wanted to have it safe."

Rossettie and Saunders said a safe event is possible without having to close buildings.

"If students put on events that are so dangerous that students cannot be allowed in the building, they should be prohibited from putting on these events, and not punish every other student and groups in the building," Rossettie said.

Tolson, however, feels the Jeans and T-Shirts Dance and a big event like Convocation First Night Activities attract different kinds of people and therefore warrant different measures when it comes to security.

"All of these kids [at the dance] are for the most part from an urban community," Tolson said. "The kids at Convocation were most likely not from the same setting."

But senior Biology major Rozelta Boyd said its ridiculous for anyone to make such an assumption.

"If where you lived has anything to do with whether something is going to happen, then people in Columbine should have been safe," Boyd said. "I really think it's ridiculous for someone to say that because these people are from the suburbs, that they don't warrant increased security."

Boyd said this is one of the only campus events she can recall in which there has been such increased security measures. To her knowledge, each year there has been security and nothing has happened.

However, Boyd said she could recall an incident three years ago in which an altercation broke out between two individuals at Asian Night. No campus police or security were present, Boyd said.

At the time, Boyd was in the Bluewall watching the "Something Every Friday" showing of Metro when a fight broke out in the Campus Center Auditorium.

"I heard the fight. It was a crowd," Boyd said. "My friends came in and told me, but I definitely heard the fight from upstairs."

Her friends informed her that one student had slammed another student's body against the concrete floor and continued to kick him.

"There wasn't one police officer there when the fight broke out," Boyd said. "In such a large group of people, I'm amazed there was no type of security."

She said that by the time the UMass Police Department arrived, another fight had already broken out. The UMPD resolved the issue with pepper spray, and Asian Night and the Campus Center were shut down. Boyd said she could smell pepper spray in the Bluewall and remembers all of the increased security on that particular night.

"If the incident happened a few years ago, why would they [UMPD] wait until now to do increased security?" Boyd said. "For me, it's a racial issue. There's always cops at the Jeans and T-Shirts Dance."

The UMPD would not comment on the issue or on the particular incident that occurred three years ago.

Many dance patrons like freshman pre-law major Manny Okrah felt the event was a success regardless of the increased security.

"The music was great," Okrah said. "People like to fight at clubs and try to express their fun, but people do stupid stuff. The security is for good reasons."

Graduate student Robert Ellis who was working head security that night said over the past years security has increased a lot, but many will not forget the past.

"The officers have not forgotten the incident and since then there's always been tight security, maybe a little oversecure at times," Ellis said. "But as long as no incident occurs, then everyone's happy."

This Saturday, in a three-hour march from the Amherst Common to the Peace Pagoda in Leverett, blacks and whites, men and women, stepped to a vision of racial equity, justice, and peace.

Saturday's march, which was preceded by a prayer for peace, brought recognition to Amherst Common, the place where a twelve-and-a-half month march to Africa began.

The march, which began on May 31, 1998, and ended on June 12, 1999, in Cape Town, South Africa, "retraced the journey of slavery," said Ingrid Askew, a participant in the march. The journey symbolically reclaimed the destinies of African-Americans and their families in Africa, who for generations lived, suffered, and died in a system of white racist ideology.

The voyagers walked an average of 20 to 25 miles a day. At night, they stayed in churches and schools and "slept on floors," Askew said.

The group, which began with 50 members and ended with 40 members, walked their way down the east coast of the U.S., until they arrived in Key West, Florida. There, they sailed on ship 74 "The Schooner Wolf," to Cuba, then Jamaica, followed by Haiti and Puerto Rico. In Puerto Rico, the group diverged, some going to Brazil, where the largest number of enslaved Africans were brought. Most went to the Cape Verde Islands of Sol and Praia. From the Cape Verde Islands, the group flew to Senegal, West

Open forum for graffiti problem

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Graffiti similar to that which appeared in Gorman Residence Hall last week has been found in other buildings on campus, according to the University of Massachusetts Office of Public Safety.

Last weekend, residents on three floors of the Central Residence Hall discovered both racial and sexist graffiti, targeted at both specific individuals and groups of students.

Students spoke in an open forum about the graffiti last Monday evening.

"There are a few of us that have had cases already this year, but we've never had anything like Gorman," Barbara O'Connor, UMass' Deputy Chief said. At least two more occurrences of such graffiti were reported in Field Residence Hall.

"People write things on the walls all the time, in the Campus Center, the academic buildings, the Student Union. That isn't an uncommon occurrence, but what happened in Gorman is," O'Connor said.

O'Connor went on to explain that sometimes the graffiti is "homophobic, racist, sexist types of graffiti" directed at individuals. Other times the graffiti is what she described as "unexplained symbols."

"Graffiti is hard to investigate because it's a very quick thing for someone to do," O'Connor said. "It takes two seconds to write something, and it it happens in residence halls, like at Gorman, random patrols can't deter it."

Solving cases, according to O'Connor, can be very difficult.

"We need to stress community on this campus, and that includes increasing the amount of communication that we have with students. If we have more communication, we are much more likely to solve cases like the one at Gorman," O'Connor said. "If there are people who think they know what happened in a case of vandalism, we need their help. Especially if it is in a residence hall."

According to O'Connor, two detectives have been assigned to the graffiti problem on campus. Gorman's case of graffiti is still under investigation. If caught, the party guilty in the Gorman incidents will face a potentially wide range of punishments.

"If you look at the civil rights law, this could be a felony of a misdemeanor, which could mean jail time for the individual or individuals involved," O'Connor said. "They would also, of course, face vandalism charges."

But O'Connor said that she isn't worried about what happens to the perpetrator.

Hurricane Floyd leaves thousands flooded and without power along eastern U.S. coast

By Brigid Schulte and Vanessa Williams
Washington Post

A quarter-million customers from Cape Fear, N.C., to Baltimore remained without power yesterday, more than four days after the deluge named Floyd swept through, and flood-ravaged areas along the Virginia-North Carolina border braced for the still-rising waters of rivers already far above recorded levels.

Officials of Baltimore Gas and Electric Co., with more than 90,000 of its customers still waiting for electricity to be restored, said Floyd was the most devastating storm in the utility's 180-year history, affecting nearly half of its 1.2 million customers.

More than half of BGE's customers waiting for the lights to come back on were in Baltimore City and Baltimore County, officials said. The utility was distributing dry ice – brought in from the Midwest – for customers to use for refrigeration.

"What we're seeing like we've never seen before is very mature, very huge trees becoming completely uprooted from all the rain of these two storms in a row," said BGE spokesman Mike Delaney, referring to hurricanes Dennis and Floyd.

Virginia Power had 12,000 customers in the state waiting in the dark late Sunday, although "virtually no one in Northern Virginia," said spokesman Tom Kazas. He blamed high water and downed trees for the delay in restoring power. "We've got to wait for the water," he said.

The situation in North Carolina was much worse, with thousands in temporary shelters while their homes and businesses lie under muddy, sewage-contaminated water. The carcasses of dead animals are creating additional health risks. It could be next week or more before power and other services are restored.

The flooding, the worst ever to hit North Carolina, is centered on Tarboro, about 20 miles off Interstate 95 in the northeastern corner of the state. Officials said the number of people forced from their homes in that area is simply too large to calculate.

Hundreds of local and state roads are closed, as well as I-95, whose southbound lanes were shut down from south of Petersburg, Va., to Rocky Mount, N.C.

In Virginia and North Carolina, rescuers took to boats yesterday to look for people still stranded on roofs and in trees, and officials were concerned about the prospect of more rain from a tropical disturbance in the Gulf of Mexico and about the growing shortage of food and clean drinking water. State officials said they received reports of waste water contamination from 20 local governments and 200 swine farmers.

Thousands filled shelters past their capacities. In Edgecombe County,

N.C., more than 2,000 evacuees were being housed and fed at a high school designed for 800 students, and hundreds more slept in their cars nearby, said Mitch Stensland, personnel director for the county school system.

"We have enough to get through each day. Then we worry about the next," said Stensland.

Sundown curfews were in effect for most of North Carolina's eastern counties. Army trucks, police cruisers and caravans of yellow dump trucks appeared to be the only vehicles on the roads. Many towns were pitch dark.

"These people are starting to run out of food," said James Mercer, director of emergency services for Edgecombe County.

In the late afternoon, four Army Chinook helicopters arrived with fresh shipments of water and food.

Watching them land, with dust swirling upward, Hampton Winnegan, 33, who has been in and out of several area shelters since Floyd hit, said:

"You feel like you're on your own, then suddenly you've got million-dollar helicopters flying in. It makes you think that someone cares."

The Tar River, for example, fell more than a foot Sunday in Rocky Mount but was not expected to crest in Greenville, N.C., 35 miles downstream, until yesterday. In Greenville, the water is expected to reach 17 feet above flood stage, according to officials at the state emergency management office in Raleigh.

Buchanan in running

By Thomas B. Edsall
Washington Post

Television commentator and GOP dissident Patrick J. Buchanan appears to have a good chance of winning the Reform Party nomination for president in 2000, although his prospective candidacy is already polarizing the embattled political organization, according to party leaders and activists.

Buchanan's likely candidacy has raised fears among some party members of a religious right takeover and triggered open warfare between forces loyal to Reform Party founder Ross Perot and those in the camp of Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura, the party's highest elected official.

But enough party leaders have put out a welcome mat to suggest that only a full-scale fight by Ventura, who has dismissed Buchanan as a "retread," or a decision by Perot to run for a third time would provide strong enough opposition to ensure a Buchanan rejection.

Professor sees peace in embattled lands

Edward Said spoke at Hampshire College in honor of Eqbal Ahmad.

By Jason Spears
Collegian Correspondent

Peaceful co-existence in lands such as Israel and Northern Ireland is the path toward peace, according to noted cultural critic and Columbia University professor Edward Said.

Said spoke at Hampshire College's Robert Crown Center last Friday in a lecture entitled "Embattled Landscapes, Unresolved Geographies." The speech was the second lecture of the annual Eqbal Ahmad Lecture series, and the launching speech for a two-day symposium on the legacy of Eqbal Ahmad.

After readings by Ahmad's brother and an introduction by Hampshire College President Gregory S. Prince, Said read several excerpts from e-mails he had exchanged with Ahmad. The wit of the correspondence gave the audience a small glimpse into the genius of Ahmad, a former professor at Hampshire College who died last spring.

Said explored the problem of disputed arcas of land, including Israel, Northern Ireland, and the Balkans. Said pointed out that the current solution to disputed lands was the partitioning of the land amongst the fighting people. In his opinion, this solution was a failure. Said cited the current state of unrest in these partitioned lands and noted that in some cases the partitioning of land had reignited the conflicts.

Said explained that partitioning stems from misperceptions. The public assumes that countries exist in homogeneity, but people have always lived amongst other peoples. He cited the example of Sweden, a country that is largely seen as homogenous, but actually has a population of 15% non-Swedes. The other common myth is that the hostility ethnic groups feel toward each other is largely an indigenous development. But Said argues that colonialists had a much heavier hand in these current disputes than credited.

Said blames these misperceptions on selective history and the misuse of identity. History, he admits, is too vast and has too many stories resulting in "disorientation as a necessity" in the retelling of history. This disorientation results in people remembering the disharmonies, rather than the harmonies that existed between people. Such beliefs give rise, in Said's opinion, to a perception of what must be true. An example is the common notion that Palestine is a Jewish state, although Israelites have had a relatively small role in the history of Palestine. Identities are then built around these misperceptions, which are social constructs that are subject to manipulation by religion or state.

To Said, education plays a large role in the formation of these selective histories and identities.

"Most, if not all, educational systems are ethnocentric or nationalistic," Said stated. "Every student is taught that his history is the most important history."

According to Said, such an educational point of view leads the student to view the rest of the world as hostile. These views, in turn, reinforce the identities of people and lead to the creation of definition, such as defined American values. Said's opinion is that all of these definitions are connected to issues of power.

At the same time, Said sees education as having the power to reverse the problem of selective histories and hostile identities.

"New ways of thinking can only occur in education," Said explained.

According to Said, what must be taught is the fluidity of community and the idea that it is not a fixed object. Education needs to erode nationalism rather than create it.

He acknowledged the need to struggle for identities, but said an understanding of relationships is also important.

This need to look beyond current dichotomies built around identities and selective history is, in the end, what Said sees as the solution to the crisis occurring in partitioned lands.

"One should look at the past," Said stated. "Provided with a new perspective, one sees them as two suffering communities."

Africa, and walked down the west coast, stopping in Nigeria, Ghana and Zambia. At all the stops, the group offered prayers of peace to the surrounding communities, Askew said.

While in America, the group visited plantations and auction sites, "all the places of suffering," Askew said. In Africa, they visited "dungeons, slave castles, and holding pens," which Askew said "was very painful."

Also while in Africa, the group was able to talk to families that had loved ones stolen from them during the colonial invasion of Africa. The group was able to tell them "[the African-American] story, from this side," Askew said. Many Africans to this day do not know what happened to their families.

"They don't have the books, they don't have the information," Askew said.

The group was also able to hear the oral histories of the Africans, about the people who survived and about the people who did not.

"It was amazing," Askew said.

With the journey complete, group members have organized a delegation that will meet Dec. 1 through 8 of this year in Cape Town, Africa. Its intention is to continue a "dialogue of world peace" and to " 'pray in' the new millennium," Askew said.

Bradley supports gays

By Ceci Connolly
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Bill Bradley continued his leftward shift last week with the boldest statements to date by any presidential candidate on gay rights.

The former New Jersey senator, in an interview with the Advocate magazine, said he would eliminate the Clinton administration's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military and would go beyond legislation to protect homosexuals in housing and employment matters. He also became the first candidate to oppose a California initiative against same-sex marriage.

Bradley brought his own unique approach to the debate over gay rights by saying he links the issue to racial harmony in America.

"We also should add sexual orientation to the 1964 Civil Rights Act," he said in the interview due on newsstands Sept. 28. "That would clearly indicate that discrimination against gays is in the same category as discrimination against other protected groups."

Bradley's remarks brought a skeptical response from civil rights leader Jesse L. Jackson, who worried aloud that reopening the 1964 law may invite the GOP-led Congress to pare back other protections.

Bradley's comments also forced Vice President Al Gore to finally take a position on the California ballot question, known as the Knight initiative. In his interview with the magazine last month, Gore said he needed to study the proposal, but by late Thursday night, Gore spokeswoman Kiki Moore said the vice president had been "educated" on the proposal and now opposes it. Bradley and Gore still oppose same-sex marriage, largely for religious reasons, but say gays and lesbians should receive domestic partner protections.

Rep. Olver birthday honor lauds service

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Correspondent

Many well-known political faces could be seen at the 63rd birthday of Democratic House Representative John W. Olver.

About 100 guests, many of whom have been avid supporters of Olver for many years, attended the annual birthday party, held at Hampshire College. Also in attendance were State Representative Ellen Story, State Senator Stanley C. Rosenberg, and U.S. Representative Rosa DeLauro.

Congresswoman DeLauro, a representative for the state of Connecticut, sits on the House Appropriations Committee and is the Assistant to the Democratic Leader. When speaking on his behalf at the event, she thanked him for his intense commitment and dedication to politics. DeLauro spoke specifically about Olver's continued support of women in politics.

"We thank John for his commitment to diversity in Congress," DeLauro said. She explained that Olver began a study several years ago on the role of women in government. When presented to the House of Representatives, the study cited a lack of women in influential government positions. DeLauro said the study results led to increased opportunities for women's participation in the political world.

DeLauro also commented that working in politics with Olver "showed me how lucky I am to serve for this governmental body." She detailed Olver's deep interest in issues that surround education and issues directly affecting those he is representing.

Olver, a former professor of chemistry at the University of Massachusetts, began his career in politics about 32 years ago. He is currently the United States House Democratic At-Large Whip and sits on both the House Appropriations Committee and the House Leadership Committee. Olver represents the largest district in Massachusetts, District 1, which spans Berkshire, Hampshire, Franklin, Worcester, and Middlesex counties.

Olver will run for the 33rd time for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives in the year 2000.

International forces to aid East Timor

By Doug Struck
Washington Post

DARWIN, Australia – International forces arrived in East Timor yesterday to begin a U.N.-sponsored mission to end the bloodletting and destruction that erupted after the province voted to become independent from Indonesia.

Officials expected 2,500 soldiers, helicopters and armored personnel carriers to be in place in the Timorese capital by yesterday afternoon.

The mostly Australian contingent will find a devastated area in which thousands of homes have been destroyed – the occupants nowhere to be found – and virtually every business has been vandalized or burned.

The troops are hoping that there will be no armed resistance. The gunmen who have rampaged in East Timor – said by witnesses to include pro-Indonesian militia members and Indonesian soldiers – have been withdrawing in recent days.

Australian Maj. Gen. Peter Cosgrove said before he left for Sunday's meeting with the Indonesian military to coordinate the deployment that his forces would "respond robustly" to any armed threat. And U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, who warned the militias not to confront the peacekeepers, said the force was prepared to strike back if attacked.

"I would hope the militia will not try to take them on, because they will defend themselves," Annan said on the CNN program "Late Edition."

Sunday's arrival of the peacekeepers will clear the way for a massive humanitarian effort to get food and shelter to the hundreds of thousands of East Timorese who fled the violence that began after the Aug. 30 referendum. There is said to be no food, water, electricity or sanitation service in East Timor.

Thousands of refugees are said to be hiding in the mountains, hungry from more than two weeks without much food.

Cosgrove was greeted in Dili, the capital city, by Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, the Indonesian commander there, who said he expected the military to hand over control of the territory to the U.N. intervention force no sooner than Saturday. Cosgrove, who toured Dili under heavy armed guard, said after the meeting that, "I will relay back to my higher authorities that the cooperation has been first class."

The Indonesian military opposed East Timorese independence and recruited the militias to try to disrupt the vote. But they have been ordered by President B.J. Habibie to make way for the international forces. Syahnakri said his forces will also help in a cleanup operation in the ruined city.

Refugee accounts that have emerged from Dili and the countryside include allegations of massacres by the militias of persons suspected of favoring independence. There have been calls for prosecutions of those responsible for human rights abuses.

With a voter turnout greater than 98 percent, East Timorese voted overwhelmingly to end Indonesia's 24-year rule.

The Australian troops, along with a contingent of 250 British army Gurkhas, were expected to secure the Dili airport and port quickly to ensure the arrival of subsequent troops.

Arriving with the troops will be officials from the U.N. Assistance Mission in East Timor, who were evacuated last week after enduring a siege at their compound in Dili, where nearly 1,500 refugees had sought safety. Those refugees were airlifted to Darwin, and are being dispersed in Australia this week.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard said in a televised address Saturday that the peacekeeping mission "could be long and protracted ... and the conditions could well be violent and dangerous. There is a risk of casualties."

Howard took note of Indonesia's objections to Australia's leading role in the 7,000-member multinational force. Jakarta feels that Australia promoted the independence of East Timor, and is not a neutral party.

"Our soldiers go to East Timor as part of a great Australian military tradition, which has never sought to impose the will of this country on others, but only to defend what is right," he said.

The multinational force is expected to stay in East Timor until the United Nations can establish some form of local civil administration and the province can provide its own security.

East Timor, a poor area of coffee plantations, was a Portuguese colony until it was invaded by Indonesia in 1975.

"We're worried about the impact of this kind of graffiti on our community. Nobody should have to worry about this kind of thing happening outside the front door of their home," O'Connor said.

O'Connor stressed that students who may have information should call 577-TIPS (8477), or the UMass detective line at 545-0893.

Should information lead to the capture of the person or persons responsible, the UMass Student Government Association is offering a $500 reward.

"That money is coming from both our accounts and University accounts," Jeff Howe, SGA's President, said. "This kind of thing shouldn't be happening on our campus."

■ BUCHANAN

While not endorsing Buchanan, those sending clear signals that they could back him include outgoing Reform chairman Russ Verney and 1996 vice presidential candidate Pat Choate – both of whom are allied with Perot – along with Lenora Fulani, the leftist third-party leader in New York who has thrown in her lot with the Reform Party.

Fulani has become a power in the Reform Party because she has a phalanx of supporters who, unlike most party activists, will vote as a block.

She said recently on CNN that she could overlook differences she has with

Buchanan concerning issues such as gay rights and abortion because Buchanan "can play a role as a unifier, bring everybody together."

Even Jack Gargan, who won the chairmanship of the Reform Party earlier this summer with Ventura's backing, differed with the Minnesota governor over Buchanan. "Buchanan's position on all the 'America first' concepts certainly fit in nicely with Reform concepts," Gargan said in an interview. "We are for a balanced budget, keeping jobs in America, tightening up on immigration, elimination of the influence of lobbyists and special interests. Buchanan has had a strong record along those lines for years."

The most adamant opposition to Buchanan is coming from Ventura and his state Reform Party leaders. Buchanan "has been out there for like eight years running as president, and I haven't heard his political reform agenda," said Dean Barkley, Ventura's former campaign chairman. "I still see him having that abortion issue and that social agenda on the front burner, and I still say if he continues to do that he's not going to sell well with a number of the people in the Reform Party."

Ventura first attempted to promote a presidential bid by former Connecticut Sen. and Gov. Lowell P. Weicker, and more recently by businessman Donald Trump. Neither has produced a groundswell of support.

Polls show Buchanan getting 8 to 10 percent of the vote as a Reform

Party candidate, with much more coming from Republican voters than Democrats. He would cost the GOP nominee a net loss of 5 percentage points, according to some analyses.

The polling does not, however, take into account the possibility that

Buchanan will stress trade and other issues that appeal to Democratic union and working-class voters. Moreover, Buchanan could pick a running mate with strong appeal to Democratic voters.

Speculation is already mounting over whom Buchanan would choose as a running mate. Among those mentioned are Teamsters president James Hoffa, former California Gov. and current Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown and renegade Ohio Democrat Rep. James A. Traficant Jr.

The possibility of a Buchanan candidacy has set the Reform Party's e-mail system on fire with messages flying across the country by the hundreds.

"GO PAT GO!!!!!!!!" wrote Linda Muller. She was backed up by Jeff Plott, who said: "Buchanan will move our party ahead to the next level."

Other Reform Party activists are nowhere near as sanguine. "Once Pat jumps, what next? BRACE YOURSELF! We will be overwhelmed by Right To Lifers. The new leaders will be Pat Buchanan, Pat Robertson, Gary Bauer," countered Ras Boltorf, Reform Party chairman of Iowa's 5th

Congressional District.

For Buchanan, whose third try for the GOP presidential nomination is floundering, there are three major reasons why the Reform Party is a very attractive campaign vehicle. First and foremost, the nominee is guaranteed

$12.6 million in federal money because of Perot's 9 percent showing in 1996, far more than Buchanan has been able to raise this year.

Second, the nomination puts the candidate into the general election, not just the primaries where Buchanan gained prominence in 1992 and 1996. As a general-election candidate, the nominee has a shot – but no guarantee – of being included in televised debates.

Finally, the candidate has the potential to set the issue agenda and influence the selection of the victor on Nov. 7, 2000. Few expect the Reform Party nominee to win the election, but Buchanan would be in a position to force debate on such favorite issues as trade, foreign intervention and American sovereignty. Depending on whether he drew more votes from Democrats or Republicans, he could determine the outcome in a close contest.

My mission, if I chose to accept it, was to infiltrate a public online chat room and humiliate all those I had contact with by publishing a column about my experiences therein.

My alias would be "Mustard_Stain," and I would go into the site with the address chat.yahoo.com, where I would painstakingly ridicule everyone I came across. I put on my wet suit and went nuts...

Seth Koenig

The room I joined was obviously a Generation X-oriented thing, filled with people named JADED_BRAT_69, snflan457, moswcj, superscrubman and Chris_Tucker_80, who is obviously a real, authentic movie star. At first, I was hesitant to partake of their wild and untamed culture, and merely observed.

The conversation was started with the insightful comments of snflan457, who said unto us: "lalala so bored." There are some deeper meanings there. Look hard.

Paying close attention to snflan457, somebody named The_Rock_555 went ahead and plugged his personal web page several thousand times without interruption. It was important for me to note that fairly common words and phrases were spelled much differently than they tend to be when normal people write them. For instance, The_Rock_555 referred to his web page as "kewl," which phonetically is understood to say what we commoners know as "cool."

Which leads us to another interesting point that needs to be brought up and studied by several expensive government committees that spend millions of dollars of tax money on their morning coffee. Is the internet forcing the intelligent people of this nation to misspell words? Simple introductions, like "hi," have been revamped to be read as "hai." I assume, then, by that logic, that "bye" turns into "bai." It's clear that the nation's youth is being corrupted by this and will soon turn to opening fire on newspaper columnists as a form of amusement. The trend must be stopped before it is too late.

Anyway, I digress. After Mr. Rock took a brief intermission in his propaganda barrage, probably because his panicked, insistent typing caused instantaneous carpel tunnel, I decided to interject in the general chat.

Mustard_Stain: Shut the hell up, Rock.

Two or three hundred random folks then joined the room and immediately left it, leaving us loyalists in the room to wonder why they stopped by in the first place, and then I got a response.

*The_Rock_555: * you*

Needless to say, I was thoroughly confused. I passed this strange starred word off to be another internet word, like "kewl", but most likely slightly less flattering. Bored by Rock, I figured I'd see why there were only two people partaking in any sort of conversation (three, if you count "lalala so bored" as part of the conversation).

Realizing that I must have a questionable word in nearly everything I said in the chat room to be respected, I put forth the query.

Mustard_Stain: Where the hell are all the (not-nice noun that sounds kind of like featherdusters)?

Chris_Tucker_80 quickly answered the question in the most eloquent way he knew how, profoundly claiming: "Where all da ladies at?"

I pined over his theory for a lengthy second or two before I decided that his explanation was not sufficient. However, without even asking for him to elaborate, Tucker, again, obviously a movie star, went into more detail: "yo where my ladies – you get your lovin' here."

That was much better.

Seeing as how nobody was doing any "lovin'" on the public screen, I figured that there must be another realm of chatting. Minutes of crucial research yielded the simple truth that, in fact, there was something known as a "PM," which stands for sex room. Luckily, an opportunity to participate in one of these rooms arose when a specific request was made by a newcomer.

Cherrykiss99: MAN?

I reviewed her lengthy and detailed requirements for a PM partner and clicked on her name. Within the small box of a PM screen, I identified myself as a man, and she seemed to think that was "kewl".

Cherrykiss99: WHO DO YOU LOOK LIKE?

Who? Strangely, Ms. Cherry did not ask "what." For support in this matter, I turned to my esteemed colleague, an internet wizard whose technical prowess rivals that of Bill Gates, Christine from the human resources department – who also happened to be the closest person in the physical world at the time. Christine suggested that I tell the nice lady online that I looked like Brad Pitt. I thought that was a bit overused, so she fell back on Ray Liotta, which, according to her, is what her brother looks like (whether this is off- or online, I never asked).

Cherry, still enthralled with her cap lock, replied to this with excitement: "WHO IS HE I DON'T KNOW HIM."

Mustard_Stain: He looks like Christine's brother.

A lengthy pause followed.

Cherrykiss99: WHO IS CHRISTINE... YOU DON'T WANT TO TALK?

Mustard_Stain: Never mind. He's a dead-ringer for Brad Pitt.

It became painfully clear to me why I wanted to make fun of these chatters in a column. So painfully so that I lost faith in the entire human race for creating such able outlets for the mentally unstable.

Needless to say, my PM session with Cherrykiss99 ended soon thereafter. Whether it was because I was bored with her or she was bored with me, I couldn't quite say. We both just stopped.

I left the room overall, too. I just went into the general chat and said, "Peace." Anti-climactic, eh?

College watching

Before me lies a huge building with windows on all sides waiting for me to enter. There are strangers here as well as friends. But today I am a Peeping Tom, taking a small, albeit superficial, joy in watching the many who stroll in and out of this building, beaming with enthusiasm that is only matched by any other school not unlike our own. So my card is swiped, my number taken, and I look for a seat. A nice one in the corner, where I can see everyone, will do.

I am observing. I sit, watching, as every person I see plays his or her part. The shy boy, sitting alone on the edge of the table waits for the pretty girl he knows to notice that he is there and ask him if he wants company while she waits too. There is the beautiful girl, perhaps too beautiful, sitting predictably in a crowd. The out-going, peppy girl, probably a cheerleader in a past life, marvels at herself for a moment because she is the center of attention, exactly where she wants to be. The awkward fellow, sitting perhaps in the wrong place, waits for that exact moment when he can say the one thing he has been thinking of since he finished his meat pie. But, he must say it at the right time, and phrase it perfectly, or he will not be accepted. These people, all quite different, have something in common. I am watching them.

There is the table-hopper. He emerges from a corner of the room, stopping by long enough to have _ of a conversation. "I'll be back," he calls as he walks away, someone else grabbing his attention. He is pleased with himself as he flutters over to the next group of friends, energized and motivated. Someone laughs at his joke, and that is his signal to move on.

A couple sits, sadly, on the verge of a break-up. They were friends, lovers, more. But in this scene of the movie, the actors cannot get along. Trying to say the right thing, they open their mouths, but the right sounds do not come out. Sagging shoulders, hands unexpressive, each is confused. She grabs her bag and leaves. She will not be back.

Not only do I watch these people, but also I listen whenever possible. I argue with them in my head, so as not to disturb them. I am afraid to interrupt. He's skipping class. She's studying for an exam worth 30% of her grade. A boy eats Apple Jacks out of a Styrofoam cup. He is looking for someone or something. He thinks that when he gets to the bottom of his cereal he will find what he is looking for.

The crowd is thinning. When I look up again there are many empty seats and tables, but there are still people to watch. More amble in, seeking, if nothing else, shelter from the rain outside. It should stop soon, a conversation says, but we are stuck between two mountains, where the clouds get trapped for days at a time.

Mark Griffin

I am still watching though. I am watching you doodle on your page because your friends are boring you. I am watching you try to tell someone something that cannot be explained. I am watching you as your gaze wanders across the room towards nothing in particular, until your eyes settle on mine. And on this day, at this very second, we are watching each other.

Your eyes wander towards the clock on the far wall; you have been here too long. For over two hours you have been visiting the salad bar and eating Popsicles, stuck in your very own DC time warp. You were talking, then studying, or pondering which class you are going to drop, because you do need to drop a class. You lost track of time.

Do not worry yourself. You are not in the Twilight Zone. You were not abducted by aliens, leaving a gap in your inner clock. You were simply enjoying a moment of time in your beloved Dining Commons, and in that pause, you were taken to another place, in another state of mind. If you have not experienced this before, it may be a shock to your system, but you have wasted half of your day here. And, you must return again in two hours for dinner. So stand up, bus your tray please, and return to your almost comfortable reality. It's time to go.

US inaction in East Timor

Over the last 25 years, the United States government has been not only a willing but an enthusiastic participant in the hell that is East Timor. Even with the newfound concern for lofty moral principals and humanitarian ideals that we witnessed so convincingly this past summer in Kosovo, the government is still not willing to take action to stop the wholesale destruction of an entire country. The action needed does not even require the movement of so much as one fingernail on one soldier from one single country. All that is required is for the U.S. government, which holds great sway over the Indonesian government and military, to stand up and say definitively, "We will not accept this any more."

Granted, the U.S. has not said anything remotely close to this even once in the past 25 years, and one should not expect such a proclamation any time soon. In 1965, when a military coup in Indonesia brought the dictator Suharto to power, the U.S. uttered not a peep of protest while he initiated what the CIA called, "one of the worst mass murders of the 20th century," in which almost 700,000 communists and suspected leftists but mostly ordinary citizens were murdered. Again in 1975 Indonesia violently invaded East Timor. While the UN general assembly was busy condemning this invasion and telling Indonesia to remove its troops, the U.S. was secretly increasing its arms sales to the Indonesian military (secret because U.S. law does not allow its military aid to be used for offensive purposes). In 1977-78, when the worst killings in East Timor were occuring, it's not surprising to find that it was the Carter Administration that decided to sell to Indonesia the war planes, bombs and napalm that it used to murder almost a quarter of the population - upwards of 200,000 people.

The United States, the whole time espousing its official non-acceptance of the annexation, has since the 1965 coup contributed immense amounts of aid to the Indonesian military, in the form of money, equipment and special training programs designed to deal with the peasant and guerrilla resistance in East Timor. The CIA has, since the coup, been training Indonesian special forces here in the U.S.

Ed May

These forces, called the Kopassus, are trained in Project Phoenix strategies. As the program used during the Vietnam War, Phoenix is directly responsible for the deaths of thousands of peasants and a general climate of terror among the South Vietnamese. These strategies were implemented quite well in East Timor and for over two decades the military held East Timor in its iron grip of violence.

These same Kopassus are the Indonesian military officials in charge of the current death and destruction. Make no mistake, the forces doing the killing are not rogue pro-Jakarta militias. There is a huge amount of evidence showing that the current destruction is exactly what the Indonesian military had planned all along; that is, if they were not able to terrify the populace into voting for autonomy within Indonesia instead of full independence. The military's campaign was spotted almost a year ago when in July of 1998 it started to establish armed civilian militias in the East Timor area. As far back as March 1999 Australia's intelligence agency reported that the military was protecting and even helping the militias they had formed.

Even when U.S. satellites spotted sharp increases in Indonesian military movement along the East Timorese border, no one paid much attention. Even more obvious were the intercepted satellite telephone conversations between high ranking officials in Dili and Jakarta saying that the militias would be ordered to implement a 'scorched-earth policy' if the independence vote went against them. However the U.S. and Jakarta continue to insist that the militias are rogue elements and the Indonesian military, while capable of controlling an entire country of 800,000 people for 24 years, simply cannot handle the militias. This is just as foolish an idea as it is false.

The Clinton Administration which was so concerned just months ago about the genocide in Kosovo and the hundreds of thousands of refugees, has said what amounts to essentially nothing on East Timor. Compared to Kosovo where before the air assault somewhere around 2,000 Kosovar Albanians had been murdered by Serb forces, at least 5,000 East Timorese have been killed in 1999. One report by Bishop Belo brings the figure up to 10,000 killed in September alone.

In the last few weeks almost every person has been uprooted, forced either to flee the cities and towns razed by the Indonesian military or join transports to West Timor and other points unknown. These crimes, the culmination of 24 years of death and destruction, should be more than adequate to launch the new humanitarian-minded U.S. into action, should they not? However the U.S. has decided that its protection of oppressed peoples applies only to countries in which it doesn't have other goals as the September 9th New York Times article explains. Apparently the administration "... must put its relationship with Indonesia, a mineral-rich nation of more than 200 million people, ahead of its concern over the political fate of East Timor, a tiny, impoverished territory of 800,000 ..."

Well, it's good to know that Mobile's oil wells in Aceh (another Indonesian province struggling for independence) and Freeport McMoRan's gold mines won't be in jeopardy over the political fate of this pathetic, impoverished nation. Political fate meaning, of course, whether the country of East Timor will continue to exist or simply be wiped off the face of the map.

For Love of the Game
Directed by Sam Raimi with Kevin Costner and Kelly Preston
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Kevin Costner, having already starred magnificently in Bull Durham and Field of Dreams, once more takes to the screen in praise of baseball, this time playing Billy Chapel, an aging pitcher hoping to play one final season and end his career with glory and dignity.

The movie is told in a series of flashbacks that occur during the last days of the Detroit Tigers' season, when Billy finds out that his team has been sold, and the new owners plan to trade him the following year. The temptation to retire, which would allow him to make a political statement about corporate involvement in baseball, as well as spend more time with his girlfriend, Jane Aubrey (Kelly Preston), is pulling against Billy's undefeatable love for the sport. This internal struggle, which reaches a peak as Billy takes to the field for his final game, provides most of the movie's conflict and momentum.

For Love of the Game is the victim of one thing and one thing only: bad writing. Costner and Preston each give fine performances, despite the shallow treatment of their characters. The story itself has a lot of potential, and the flashback style of storytelling the movie employs is well executed. All of this goes to waste, however, thanks to a script packed with limp dialogue and characters.

Also at the center of this movie's problem is its attempt to juggle two completely different stories. Half of the time, we're watching a veteran ball player wage a war against his age to continue playing the game he has loved for so many years. The other half of the time, we're watching a typical long-distance relationship movie lacking in sincerity.

During the baseball half of the equation, the movie shines, romanticizing the sport in a way not corny and over-the-top, but truly interesting. The strategizing and tactical head-butting that occurs among the pitcher, the batter, and the catcher is recreated in such a way that the audience is quickly drawn into the struggle; we begin to see how every pitch is a chess move, every pause, every gesture is a calculated attempt to gain the upper hand.

The romance between Billy and Jane, unfortunately, is not nearly as engrossing. Their relationship lacks any really substance or chemistry. Sure, the actors laugh and kiss and carry on as though they're in love, but none of it comes across as believable. The dialogue sounds awkward and unrealistic, like it was cut-and-paste out of daytime drama TV.

The script does offer a respectable amount of humor and some enjoyable touchy-feely scenes with Billy, Jane, and Jane's troubled teenage daughter, but all of this starts to feel like an unnecessary distraction from the baseball story. Or maybe the baseball distracts us from the romance story, but in the end, the writing in For Love of the Game is too weak to support both halves of the movie.

For Love of the Game comes frustratingly close to being a solidly entertaining film about one of the most unifying facets of American culture, but the deficiencies in writing are just too significant. A fun rental, perhaps, but nothing more.

Box Office Topped By Blue Streak

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

As expected, this weekend's two openers, Blue Streak and For Love of The Game, topped the box office. What is surprising though is that the Martin Lawerence comedy/action flick Blue Streak beat the more adult oriented Kevin Costner romance.

Blue Streak, which calls to mind last year's smash hit Rush Hour, raked in $19.2 million dollars on 2735 screens for a $7020 per screen average. Despite garnering almost 100 more screens (2829), For Love of The Game collected a disappointing $14 million dollars, giving it second place for the weekend. Still, with Message in a Bottle ($52.8 million gross) and now this, Kevin Costner will likely have two $50 million grossers in a row, which is a definite career improvement.

The Sixth Sense continues to hold screens (2788) and is getting lots of repeat business. Its $11.2 million was good enough for third and second overall among summer releases ($215 million). Depending on next week's dropoffs for Blue Streak and Love of The Game, The Sixth Sense might once again claim the number one spot, a remarkable feat.

Last weekend's two openers were next. Stigmata experienced a dreadful 51% dropoff from last weekend's $18.5 million, collecting only $9 million in it's second week and $52.6 million overall. Sin of Echoes faired much better, posting a solid $3.9 million, a very respectable 33% dropoff from its opening week ($11.9 over all).

Runaway Bride was sixth with $2.6 million. Theater owners continue to play Julia Roberts' latest as it still holds 2584 screens. And at this rate The Thomas Crown Affair will still be playing at Thanksgiving when the latest Bond flick, The World is Not Enough, opens. It continues to chug along with $2 inillion more this week.

Bowfinger, with $1.6 million and $63 million overall placed eighth. The 13th Warrior ($1.5 million and $29.4) and Mickey Blue Eyes ($1.1 million and $72.1) rounded out the top 10.

This week's biggest box office story though happened at number 11. American Beauty collected $241,000 on only 16 screens for an unbelievable $52,563 average calling to mind The Blair Witch Project's numbers. The film stars Kevin Spacey and Annette Bening in a story about the darker side of middle-class, white America. Reportedly, Steven Spielberg, head of producer Dreamworks, read the script on a Saturday and greenlighted it the following Monday, without changing a single word.

Releases from Beatles, Days

J.D. Considine
The Baltimore Sun

What's the difference between a soundtrack and a songtrack? At first glance, the answer seems obvious: A soundtrack is an album of music from a motion picture, whereas a songtrack is a silly word somebody made up. Simple enough.

But in the case of the Beatles' "Yellow Submarine Songtrack" (Capitol 21481), the term "songtrack" actually makes some sense, at least on the marketing end. Because what people tend to remember most about the musical interludes from the 1968 feature-length cartoon was the way the animators translated such classics as "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" and "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds" into Peter Max-style Technicolor fantasies.

Trouble was, neither of those songs was on the original soundtrack album. Sort, indeed, were such other featured favorites as "Nowhere Man," "With a Little Help From My Friends" or "When I'm Sixty-Four." What the first "Yellow Submarine" album offered was four new tunes, a couple of retreads ("All You Need Is Love," which was originally on "Magical Mystery Tour," and the title tune, which hailed from the "Sgt. Pepper" album), and a big chunk of George Martin's orchestral score for the film.

In other words, "Yellow Submarine" the soundtrack was even less a Beatle album than "Yellow Submarine" the film was a Beatle movie (the voice acting was all done by non-Beatles). Despite its awkward title, "Yellow Submarine Songtrack" rectifies much of that. No, it doesn't put the real Beatles' voices into the film, but it does restore all their music to the album. And that's a start.

After all, what made "Yellow Submarine" worth watching in the first place was the way it acted as a sort of visual "Greatest Hits" collection for the band. From the memorable melancholy of "Eleanor Rigby" to the hallucinatory cheer of "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds," the film showed the Fab Four at their most pop-friendly and appealing.

Granted, the film pretty much ignores the rough-and-ready rockers who gave us "She Loves You" and "Twist and Shout." But hey, those guys already had two movies ("A Hard Day's Night" and "Help!") in which to strut their stuff. And "Yellow Submarine" does at least make a nod in that direction with George Harrison's gritty, fuzz-toned rejection rocker, "Think for Yourself."

But be warned, even though this new disc is markedly different from the original "Yellow Submarine" album, it doesn't include any previously unreleased Beatle songs. So if you already have the songs from the movie on other Beatle albums, there's no real need to own the "Yellow Submarine Songtrack" - unless, of course, you like the convenience of having them all in one package, just like the movie.

If your notion of heavy rock insists on towering Marshall stacks, Days of the New main man Travis Meeks is out to change your mind. Because even though "Days of the New" lacks the crunch of Metallica or Pantera, it delivers every bit as much punch. What Meeks understands is that what matters isn't the size of your amps, but the power of your songs. It helps that Meeks' gruff baritone sparks against the minor key melodies as effectively as Eddie Vedder ever has, but the album's real kick is that Meeks is working with an insanely broad palette. From the orchestral exoticisms of "Weapon & Wound" (think "Kashmir" fused with "Norwegian Wood") to the dark riffage of "Not the Same" (think Metallica meets Pink Floyd), "Days of the New" proves that, with the right attitude, any kind of music can be rightly considered heavy.

Forget those other Latin superstars trying to muscle their way onto the charts; what you really want is pop appeal on the scale that Lou Bega offers on "A Little Bit of Mambo." Thanks to the blend of hip-hop attitude, Caribbean charm, and big-band swing he wields in "Mambo No. 5 (A Little Bit of...)," Bega comes across like a latter-day Louis Prima – sassy, sexy and totally entertaining. Moreover, he maintains that momentum throughout, moving from the neo-mambo of "I Got a Girl" to the tropical techno of "The Most Expensive Girl in the World" without dropping a beat. Best of all, Bega's macho swagger is supported by the strength of his beats, meaning his music is as fresh and infectious as anything on radio right now.

Travis Meeks goes solo and surprises abound on Days of the New's second self-titled album

FIRST
Brendan O'Donnell
Hive Records

Brendan O'Donnell is a young singer-songwriter passion for music and powerful vocals have led to his first full-length recording, appropriately entitled First. On the album, Brendan sings and plays both acoustic and electric guitars. The rest of the album is filled out by a bass guitar (Colton Calvert), drums (Grey Tegeler) and interestingly a violin (Marco Vitalli), of which I first makes particularly good use.

Brendan cites the music of Harry Chapin as his primary reason for including the violin. Chapin's masterful orchestrations impressed the musician so much that he has tried to include some type of stringed instrument in every band that he has ever been in.

The album's first track, "I laime" is a good example of the fusion of sound that runs throughout the disk. Particularly during the interludes between verses, the blend of guitar and violin is refreshing. In fact, the violin serves this purpose often, providing smooth transitions between separate pieces of songs. The rest of the track consists of a riff very similar to "Here in Our Graves" by Dave Matthews. Other than the use of violin though, I would say that the musical comparisons to DMB are unfounded.

"21st Century Love" serves as a stark contrast to the first track. It's darker and kind of moods with heavy bass, dressed up by some audio tracks. It reminds me of something you would hear by a very mellow alternative rock group these days and may also be the best example of the kind of intricate violin pieces that the album can attain.

My favorite track of the album, "Concrete Wave" comes next. The track is like a good piece of classical music, arranged beautifully. Plus, O'Donnell's yearning vocals as he sings "On the highway all the world/Looks the same/ Riding on a makeshift bus/Low on gas and out of luck" hold the song together. I would be remiss if I did not point out the eerie similarity between his voice and Natalie Merchant's. It's really not even a male Natalie Merchant, just Natalie.

The upbeat melody of "Today" doesn't seem to match the mourning lyrics, but it's fun to hear Brendan do his best Dave Matthews impression. "yeah."

"Cry Baby," the sixth track, is probably the best example of the kind of folksy pop that you'll hear on First. It's just Brendan and his acoustic guitar fitting words and sounds into tightly-knit spaces.

The last few tracks don't live up to the tremendous promise of the first half. "This Life," a soulful search for some answers, seems a bit too typical – especially when it's placed at the end of the album. "Break" doesn't do anything special to make it noteworthy. However, "These Moments" is especially rhythmic – like some foreign dance I don't know the name of. Overall, First is a fairly bold and eclectic debut. O'Donnell doesn't do anything groundbreaking, but he has a keen ear for blending instrumental sound and arranging music. Vocally, he's the love child of Dave Matthews and Natalie Merchant. He aims high and often achieves excellent results. His musical talent and songwriting can only improve with time and experience.

Cosmo Replicates Itself

Mary K. Feeney
The Hartford Courant

When CosmoGIRL! made its debut in July, the publishing world was expecting a Lolita-ish version of its parent publication, Cosmopolitan.

Their expectations were wrong, as it turns out. Now, however, with the second issue of the bimonthly magazine on newsstands, there's more buzz about CosmoGIRL!, and this time it's not quite as celebratory.

Lisa Lombardi, editor-in-chief of Twist, a nearly two-year-old teen magazine, was shocked when she opened the first issue of CosmoGIRL! to find that three of the inside features were similar to those in her magazine.

In one feature, which has young women recounting their most embarrassing moments, CosmoGIRL! appears to have appropriated wholesale a graphic device called a "Blushometer," which measures the chagrin according to blushing facial hue. CosmoGIRL! uses similar facial icons, and the same Blushometer name. "It struck me how blatant it was," Lombardi says. "It's too much to be a coincidence."

Lombardi mentions other similarities in the first issue, including its celebrity cartoon "bubbles," in which celebrities are given fake dialogue (Twist's is called "Whatever," CosmoGIRL!'s is "What?!?"), and similar icons for rating movies. The second issue of CosmoGIRL!, Lombardi says, contains even more odd similarities.

E-mail This Boy," a Twist column in which readers are encouraged to contact "regular guys," is quite a bit like CosmoGIRL!'s "e-male." Another regular feature, called "The Twist Test," in which young male celebrities answer questions in their own handwriting, bears a resemblance to CosmoGIRL!'s "CosmoGUY! Data Sheet." These similarities have not gone unnoticed, receiving coverage in an August story in MediaWeek and in the magazine Folio.

Several magazines have registered trademarks for their inside features and columns. The New Yorker, for example, has a trademark on its name and the "Shouts and Murmurs" and "Talk of the Town" columns. The Meredith Corporation, publisher of Ladies' Home Journal, owns the rights to the magazine's "Can This Marriage Be Saved?" feature, and Newsweek has trademark protections on some of its section headings, including "Periscope," which includes the popular "Conventional Wisdom" item.

Some of the Twist's columns or features is individually trademarked, but because each issue is sent to the federal copyright office, the entire issue is copyrighted, a spokeswoman said.

Very few magazines trademark every standing feature," says David J. Wittenstein, head of the intellectual property group at Dow, Lohnes & Albertson in Washington. "The way the U.S. trademark law works, there are two different ways to get rights. One is to register the mark. The other is just to use the mark. You get rights in a mark just by using it in commerce."

Twist has been printing features such as the "Blushometer" for some time and may be covered by a kind of right called a "common law" right.

Certainly, if you have a valuable mark, it's crazy not to register it," Wittenstein says.

As of this week, Twist had no plans for legal action, Lombardi said. "All we try to do is to stay one step ahead of the competition, and we take it as a great big compliment. They happened to copy things that are incredibly popular, and we're not going to change them just to change them. We were there first."

CosmoGirl! isn't saying much. Last week, the publicist for editor Atoosa Rubenstein had set up an interview but canceled it abruptly after hearing that the Twist controversy would be the subject of the conversation. Requests for a subsequent interview were referred to an in-house spokeswoman for Hearst Communications Incorporated, the publisher. "The magazine is completely original. There's no trademark on the concepts," said Jill Davidson of Hearst. "All I can really tell you is that Atoosa had to run out to a newsstand to see what Twist was even talking about. I can just offer you what I just told you. OK? Thanks very much."

New Law & Order Has Darker Mood

Diane Werts
Newsday

Call it "Law & Order Lite." Or "Law & Order Heavy." NBC's new spinoff series is two shows in one, in a manner much different than its split-personality predecessor.

"Law & Order: Special Victims Unit" lightens up the workaholic resolve of its hit parent by delving into the personal lives of its New York cops. But "SVU" also darkens the mood with its focus on a sex-crimes unit that investigates the sickest and most flagrant of sordid misdeeds. Case in point: Monday's premiere, where this "elite squad" is assigned the grisly multi-stab murder of a cabbie where the perpetrator(s) also "sliced off his cigar and took it with 'em."

Yuck.

If you can stomach the details and keep the kids away from the set at this early hour (be aware "L&O" creator Dick Wolf has publicly blasted NBC for not scheduling his adult show at 10 o'clock), you'll be rewarded with the usual spellbinding piecing together of tales even more twisted than in the original "L&O" (which returns Wednesday night at 10 for its 10th season).

We need the relief of a light moment every now and then, perhaps to be supplied in the future by Richard Belzer's John Munch character, transplanted from "Homicide's" Baltimore to this Manhattan setting. But he's ill-used in the first episode after a nice introductory how-do-you-do ("Do you think that your conclusional pole vaults are personality- or gender-based?" he queries a female detective), even after returned Dann Florek (of "L&O's" 1990-1993 seasons) promises to tap Munch's "vast puncture-wound experience." We have to settle mostly for his conspiracy theories and an occasional "slice and dice" aside.

Luckily, we're quickly swept into the emotional orbit of Tariska Hargitay as an SVU detective who takes her job way too personally, for reasons revealed late in the game by mom Elizabeth Ashley. Hargitay is starting to cement herself as one of the more magnetic performers on the tube; she had us transfixed during her "ER" stint as Anthony Edwards' unstable girlfriend, who ultimately proved herself more mentally together than her guy. Here, she's a heartbreaker, not romantically but spiritually, acting tough to camouflage a fundamental tenderness. There's so much ferment in her simmering soul, she seems about to burst through the screen. If only she would, and we could give her the hug she covets.

That task is figuratively left up to Christopher Meloni (Chris Keller on HBO's "Oz"), her rock of a partner, himself a family man with four kids, juggling school visits with case calls. "There's no crying in baseball," he cautions Hargitay, who's on "thin ice" with Florek for her subjective behavior.

They're supported by stimulating guest stars and gritty locations, two key strengths of Wolf's New York-shot series. Though Monday night's "SVU" premiere starts slowly, it soon picks up steam, as we discover secret identities, tangled motives, red herrings. It'd spoil the show to give away much more, but for a while the cops aren't even sure who the victim truly is. Before long, world politics blunder into the mix, and Hargitay is out to right global wrongs. It's a heady start for a series that could quickly become the kind of keeper its predecessor has proven to be.

Sorority Formal Recruitment
Fall 1999

Come Check us Out!

Greek Life provides an awesome chance to get involved with the University, to meet new people and have fun!

For more information or to sign up for recruitment, stop by our table on the Campus Center Concourse Monday, Sept. 13 - Tuesday, Sept. 21 from 10am until 3pm or call the Office of Greek Affairs at 545-2712 and ask for Allison or Zihla

YOUR Student Government Association

My name is Jeff Howe and I am your Student Government Association President. It is my responsibility to run a government that works to improve our university. The SGA has primary responsibility over issues concerning student affairs on campus. In the coming year I will work to change the ways this university runs, so that we all can have a better experience at UMass. My personal goal is to change the way that the judicial system works at UMass. Students who are charged need to have sound advice and students who are in danger of being expelled or suspended should be able to hire legal counsel. If you have any problems or questions feel free to contact me at 545-1287.

WHAT WE HAVE DONE

1. We convinced Housing to distribute a letter that we wrote to inform all on campus students of the rights to privacy they enjoy in their dorms.
2. We felt that 7 a.m. was too early for the parking meters on campus to run, so we worked with Parking Services and had them change the time to 9 a.m..
3. Housing will no longer move a student from a single unless there is demand for that room, even if the student cannot pay for the single.
4. We worked with campus administration to establish a Task Force on Admission to create a new admission policy that will insure a diverse campus.
5. We created an RSO Resource Center that will provide computer, printers, scanners and fax machines free of charge to all RSO's. The center will also be open at times that will be more student friendly.

My name is Sandra Brookley. As Secretary of the Registry, I am responsible for the registration of all Registered Student Organizations (RSO's) on campus. I mediate problems, help with constitutions and support RSO's. I am also the Chair of the new Programming Board. If anyone would like to start an RSO, find one that already exists or learn about how to become involved in the programming board please feel free to call me at 545-0343.

WHAT WE WILL DO

1. Have cameras installed in the yellow lot by Alumni Stadium and in the lot at the Career Center to help prevent violent crime and deter people from vandalizing vehicles.
2. Create a Course and Teacher Evaluation Guide (CATE Guide), so before you choose a class you can see how other students liked it.
3. Change the Your Campus Meal Plan to include Student Businesses such as Earth Foods and Greenough Snack Bar.
4. Make the Commonwealth College a more diverse learning community.
5. Alter the university judicial system so students in hearing can have advocates speak on their behalf. Allow students who are in danger of being expelled or suspended to have a lawyer represent them at their hearing.
6. Change the New Students Program to be FUN! A student's first impression of UMass should not make them fear our university. We can do better.
7. Encourage broader student participation is governing this campus.
8. Work with the Provost's office and faculty to provide better training for Teaching Assistants (TA's).
9. Initiate a thorough study of how this campus reports and responds to sexual assault and rape. Implement changes to insure fairness and sensitivity.
10. Party like it's 1999!!!!! Hey, you gotta keep it real.

My name is Eleanor Gerome and I am your Student Attorney General. As Attorney General I work with Student Legal Services as legal counsel to the SGA. I work with the Student Judiciary about various issues as well as the Dean of Students Office for relevant Code of Student Conduct violations. This semester I will be working with students to add a section to our By-Laws that will define the role of Area Governments and House Councils. I will also be restructuring judicial records and be reviewing sexual assault and rape responses across campus. If you are interested in becoming involved in any of these projects or would like information, please contact me at 545-1880.

My name is Sheila Tunney, and I am the Secretary of Administrative Affairs. My responsibilities include advising Area Governments and house councils, and coordinating the daily operations of the SGA office. In addition, I am President Howe's liaison to nine agencies, which includes the Office of ALANA Affairs, Student Legal Services, the Center for Student Businesses, and University Productions and Concerts (UPC). This fall I will work to insure that Area Governments and house councils assume their roles as vital branches of the SGA and work with Residential Life to build community in residential areas. I will also work to insure that the concerns of the agencies are properly communicated, and that measures are taken to solve them. I can be reached at 545-1284 if you need further information.

Hello, my name is Malika Tafawa and I hold the position of Secretary of Finance. I am the primary financial officer of the Student Government Association. I would encourage all members of Agencies, RSO's, and members of other areas of student governance to approach me with budget or spending inquiries. I hope to bridge any gaps that exist between the SGA and student organizations on campus. I look forward to working with you and ask you to contact me at 545-1880 if you ever have any questions.

My name is Seth Avakian and it is my honor to serve you as your Student Trustee. As a member of the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees, I along with Student Trustees from the other four campuses and seventeen Trustees appointed by the Governor, work to ensure the University is well governed and well funded. Currently the Board of Trustees is evaluating the potential benefits of privatization. I assure you that factors such as the availability and flexibility of student jobs, the survival of the Student Businesses, the cost to students and the quality of service will not be forgotten when looking at the "bottom line." I also advocate for students on campus, and ensure our collective voice is heard loud and clear. I want to hear your opinions and concerns. Contact me at 545-1288.

My name is Mikale Billard and I am your Speaker of the Student Government Senate. As Speaker, I am in charge of the Senate body, which consists of 60 to 70 students. The Senate has primary responsibility in recommending policy for student affairs. As Speaker, I advocate on the Senate's behalf through the Administration.

I am very concerned with safety on campus and will strive to make this campus a better place to live. I, along with my colleagues, will be organizing a safety walk on Oct. 5, and will be active on the Committee on Safety. If anyone would like to get involved either in the Senate or interested in safety issues, please contact me at 545-1286.

My name is Jared Brooslin and I am your Secretary of Public Policy and Relations. My role is to inform the students and the community about the issues that are occurring in the SGA and at the same time create an enjoyable, yet professional atmosphere in the Senate. My main goal is to make sure the media is aware of events that affect students on and off of campus. Any student who has ideas to get more students involved in the SGA please contact me at 545-0343.

My name is Jennifer Teixeira and I am the Associate Speaker of the Senate. My job is to be the chief clerk and parliamentarian of the Senate. In other words, I maintain the records of the Senate and ensure that Senate meetings are run by the rules set forth by the SGA Constitution and By-Laws. My focus this year will be working alongside the Secretary of Public Policy and Relations, Jared Brooslin, to get students involved in student government and the various campus committees. The first step in making a difference on this campus is to get involved. If you are interested, please stop by 420 Student Union, or you can call the Speaker's Office at 545-1286.

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) - Your organizational skills will pay off handsomely today, as you attempt to corral the skills of many, and channel them into a single endeavor.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) - A complicated issue may arise today which demands a second look - even after you've come to a final judgment. Be ready to change your mind!

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) - A frustration which presents a major emotional obstacle may arise early in the day. It may be time to go back to the drawing board.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) - A little temporary excitement can actually lead to something permanent and spiritually-fulfilling today. Explore your options and keep the doors open.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 10) - It'll be up to you to keep a friend - most likely the Cancer or Leo native - from doing something that is patently unwise and ill-advised.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) - Now is not the time to pick up those bad habits that you abandoned long ago. Remember that you needn't rely on those same old, unhealthy crutches.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) - Share your feelings with those closest to you today and you're sure to get the validation you've been needing in recent days.

Aries (March 20-April 19) - Though you may be expecting something of a blowout today, you're far more likely to be in for a long and close contest. It's anyone's game.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) - It is important that you do things one at a time today, and that you focus intently on each individual endeavor as you tackle it.

Gemini (May 21-June 20) - One long-term project that is finally finished is likely to lead directly to another, which can get a head start before this busy day is out.

Cancer (June 21-July 22) - This is a good day to enjoy outdoor activities. Solitary pursuits may be favored early on, but later in the day, you'll want to mix and mingle.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) - With all the help, assistance and guidance you're likely to have today, you must never forget that when it gets down to it, you're on your own.

There's a new martial arts style when they study only in the U.S.. It's called Phoo-Ee.

That means "feel the pressure until you snap."

Mostly it's practiced by adults throwing children under 5 years old around the dojo.

The whole trick is to do it without hurting the child at the same time as you feel a deep sense of relief.

This new style naturally began in the private homes of young mothers in New Jersey.

Since then it has steadily sprout. Occasionally small yappee dogs are substituted for the children.

Minutemen are class of '99 UMass Soccer Classic

Four named to All-Tournament team after wins over Siena, Washington

Matt Crocker
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend marked a return to tradition and a return to the win column for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team as they toppled all competition in the UMass Men's Soccer Classic.

The teams that participated along with the Minutemen in this year's tournament were the University of Hartford, Siena College and nationally ranked University of Washington. Each team played two games over the course of the weekend at Totman Field. UMass was placed opposite Siena on Saturday and Washington on Sunday.

The University of Massachusetts dominated Siena, posting a 3-0 shutout and a first-round win in the tournament on Saturday. Sophomore Fred Kinateder scored the first and winning goal, unassisted, approximately midway through the first half. Towards the conclusion of the same half, Kinateder's goal was followed by two others to insure the Minutemen's victory. The first came courtesy of freshman forward Jeff Deren, off an assist by sophomore midfielder Mike Iamusz. Shortly after came the second goal off the foot of Yuri Morales, with some help from Deren and junior Matt Christy. Sophomore goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn played a solid game in net, making eight saves in securing the shutout for UMass. Quinn now has accumulated two shutouts in as many starts for the Minutemen.

"We had a great first half against Siena, especially at the end of the first half where we scored the goals," Massachusetts coach Sam Koch said. "We didn't play as well in the second half with a three nothing lead, but there are still some things we need to work on."

After downing Siena, UMass moved on to Sunday where they conquered the challenge offered by the No. 16 University of Washington. The Minutemen defeated the Huskies 3-2 eight minutes into overtime to clinch a win in the second and final round of the Classic. Senior and current leading scorer for the Minutemen Adam Black stole the ball and went through the Washington defense to put the winning goal in the corner of the net, his second goal of the game.

UMass controlled much of play throughout the first half, possessing a 2-0 lead as they broke for halftime. Black drove home the first goal with a header seven minutes in, after getting some assistance from senior back Jonathan Bibb and Iamusz. Towards the end of the half, junior forward Seth Lilburn stole the ball and blasted a goal into the back of the Washington net, giving UMass a bigger lead at halftime.

However the seeded Huskies were not about to lie down to the Minutemen, and caused a breakdown in the Maroon and White defense late in the second quarter. Washington scored twice in two minutes, evening out the score at two-all and pushing the game into overtime.

"Washington is an excellent team. They are a very well-coached and well-organized team," said coach Koch. "We finished our chances and they didn't. We made a big step forward today and that's what it's all about."

At the conclusion of the tournament, this season's 1999 UMass Classic All-Tournament Team was announced, with four University of Massachusetts Minutemen being nominated. Johnathan Bibb, senior forward Todd Baron, Seth Lilburn, and junior back Patrick Beattie all received accolades for their performance in the tournament.

Senior goalie, Todd Fowler, earned the Florence Savings Bank "Classic save of the Tournament." Fowler received the award for a fantastic diving save, preventing a Washington penalty kick from scoring. This allowed the Minutemen to reach overtime where they eventually emerged the victor.

Black, who posted the final and winning goal against the Huskies, was the tournament's Most Valuable Player. It was Black's second goal of the day and fifth of the season.

"I think we are in good shape. I think we are playing better. I think we are ready to face our conference games," said Koch. "We have a big game on Saturday against Rhode Island, and that's the game that counts. We're going against one of the best teams in the conference, and we have our work cut out for us."

Along with being good preparation for upcoming Atlantic 10 games, the tournament gave UMass the opportunity to stop a streak of five years and begin another of two games. The University hosted the last UMass Men's Soccer Classic in 1994. Coincidentally, that was the last time the Minutemen were seated at the top of the Atlantic 10. With the return of the fall Soccer Classic, the long hiatus of University-sponsored tournament play has been brought to an end. At the same time, the Minutemen picked up two wins, beginning a streak of victories that will usher them into their first conference game against the University of Rhode Island on Saturday.

Minutemen bow to Wildcats, 26-21

Bankhead, Shipp spin wheels against Villanova D

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

VILLANOVA, PA – Leaving the field with 26 points against the Massachusetts football team had a dramatically different feel to it this time around for Villanova.

Last season, UMass ran over the Wildcats on the road to the NCAA Division I-AA National Championship with a 36-26 victory that was not that close. Villanova's superstar quarterback, Chris Boden, had possibly the worst game of his career, completing 15 out of 49 passes for a mere 185 yards, being intercepted twice.

This year, when time expired, Boden, and all the other Wildcats, felt completely different. The UMass signal caller had an arguably worse statistical day, hitting 18 of his 40 attempts for only 168 yards, again being picked off twice. The team put the same amount of points on the board, as well, but everything was different. This time the defending champs got on the bus on the low end of a 26-21 heartbreaking score in a game that, like its predecessor, wasn't that close.

The biggest change between the two years happened to the Villanova defense. The 'Cats abused the Minutemen for seven sacks, two interceptions, and two fumble recoveries, while holding Walter Payton Award candidate Marcel Shipp to a quiet 102 yards, his lowest output since the beginning of last season.

"Coach set out a challenge for us to get a pass rush, because a lot of times teams come in and beat us passing," said Villanova defensive tackle Kwest Solomon, responsible for two sacks and a fumble recovery on the day.

"With our program, we've had three different defensive coordinators in three years," Wildcat Coach Andy Talley said. "You never know how hard that's going to be on your team until you go through it. Now these guys have been under (defensive coordinator) Jim Fleming for a second year and they understand the system and it's a little bit easier for them."

The system was easy enough to help the Villanova cause with a tight end-an unrelenting rush on UMass passer Todd Bankhead, who was statistically solid with a 25 for 38, 261-yard day, but spent much of the afternoon on the ground.

The Minutemen could not get on the scoreboard until the tail end of the first half, when, with eight seconds remaining, Bankhead finished off a six-play, 80-yard sprint of a drive that took only 45 ticks to complete, with a one-yard plunge to cut the lead to 21-7. The drive showcased last week's Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week Adrian Zullo, who ended the game with 11 catches for 125 yards.

Wildcat Casey Hannon kicked off the scoring with two field goals on drives that were dangerously close to yielding touchdowns before Massachusetts dug in and forced the respective kicks.

Chris Boden continued both the onslaught and his personal streak of consecutive games with a touchdown pass, now at 27, when he connected with fullback Cameron Cross in the flats with 8:55 left in the second quarter. A short rifle from Boden to monstrous 6-foot-7 tight end Joe Kavanaugh for the two-point conversion upped the lead to 14-0.

Villanova scored again roughly four and a half minutes later when tailback Ducamel Augustin, with 13 carries and 122 yards on the day, broke a tackle and split the UMass defense for a 44-yard scoring jaunt that seemed to take the wind out of the Minuteman sails.

Down by 14 entering the second half, Massachusetts continued to try in vain to gain the momentum. Just 59 seconds into the quarter, after the teams exchanged back-to-back interceptions, Bankhead was called for intentional grounding in the back of the end zone as he was taken to the ground by Solomon.

The Minutemen would manage to make things interesting with an 89-yard, 15-play marathon drive that ended with a 7-yard touchdown run by Shipp at the 7:01 mark in the third. Another Hannon field goal for Villanova with just over a minute to go in the quarter would set the stage for an exciting finale.

UMass squandered three drives before forcing the Wildcats to punt the ball with 4:15 remaining in the game. Down 26-14, Massachusetts worked their way to the opposing 39-yard line, where Shipp would gather in a screen pass and go the distance to cut the lead to under a touchdown, 26-21.

Villanova got the ball back with 1:53 to go and ran 53 seconds off the clock before being forced to kick it away. Minuteman Coach Mark Whipple opted to let the clock run and keep his three timeouts for offense.

UMass received the ball at their own 40 yard line with 55 ticks to go, and moved the ball steadily upfield, until, as had been the case all game, the effort was slowed considerably by a Wildcat sack.

"I think the play that really killed us was the sack," Whipple said. "No. 45 just beat our tackle and set us back. We were moving the ball, we had a second and three at their 36. I think, and we had to take another time out."

Still, with time for two plays, the Minutemen had a chance.

"I don't know what happened on the second to last play," Bankhead admitted. "The (snap) went over my head. I didn't call for it, but the crowd was pretty loud, so [center Maikel Miret] probably couldn't hear... The ball went around last year and he came back and played a great game."

Wait a second. This is UMass football, the same group of guys who had 9 of their 15 games last season decided in the final minute or overtime. Of course it wasn't over.

Middle linebacker Kole Ayi intercepted Boden's errant throw on a screen pass and all of a sudden, the Minutemen offense had a shot to get on the board before halftime. They did. With just 63 yards of total offense to their credit at that time, the Minutemen went to work, driving 80 yards in 43 seconds to close within 14 points heading into the locker room.

It was taken for granted that after the Minutemen lost their three biggest receivers that the defense would have to step up its role in the formula for success. After all, it returned nine starters from a unit that began to bond during the Minutemen's playoff run last season.

Ayi is the leader, following up a solid 16-tackle performance last weekend against New Hampshire with nine tackles Saturday. Dan Healey, who made his third career start at linebacker, recorded 10 tackles and two sacks. The defensive front put pressure on Boden all afternoon, forcing the All-America candidate into a dreadful 18-for-40 performance and two interceptions. The secondary had six pass breakups. Overall, the defensive unit played 35 minutes, including 20 of the first half's 30 minutes.

Yet the Minutemen still had a shot.

"It would've been highway robbery," Whipple said. "They played harder than us and played better than us. They deserved to win."

In the second half, Villanova held on for dear life, clinging to a five-point lead after tearing the Minuteman defense apart in the first half. Boden completed just 4 of 15 attempts for 25 yards after intermission. It turned out that the lead built in the through one half was too much for UMass to handle, but don't blame the defense.

Last year it was different. The defense barely had to show up the way the offense would put points on the board. With new faces in new places, the Minuteman defense seemed suspect, especially after yielding 367 points in 11 games in 1997. Two years later, it is the backbone of a team whose championship dreams aren't getting much reverence even after just two games.

UM volleyball chews up Dayton, falls to Musketeers

By James Piehl & Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team had the opportunity to seize control of the Atlantic-10 Conference after beating Dayton on Saturday, but dropped the ball by losing to Xavier on Sunday.

Saturday saw UM taking on the Flyers of Dayton, and immediately coming out strong on its way to a 3-1 victory, 15-1, 15-7, 12-15, 18-16. The Minutewomen dominated game one with help from a struggling Flyers offense which only hit a paltry .086, while UMass tallied .400. Game two was once again controlled by the Minutewomen, as they easily won by eight. In Game three, Dayton's setter, Carla Muntz, caught fire, as the Flyers edged UM. The deciding game four was also a struggle for both teams, as they each posted 12 errors before the Minutewomen closed it out.

"Their setter struggled early-on, but then she got hot in the third game. I was surprised that it took her so long because we knew she was capable of playing well," said UMass head coach Bonnie Kenny.

Sophomore Janeen Demarte raised her career-high kill record with 20 and tallied a double-double, adding 18 digs (just one shy of tying her career-high dig record). Another strong performance was turned in by sophomore Heather Holtsberg, who registered 58 assists and 12 digs of her own. Seniors Jill Meyers and Kari Hogancamp also chipped in double-doubles, recording 19 kills, 14 digs and 10 kills, 20 digs respectively.

JANEEN DEMARTE

"I thought we tried too hard sometimes and when we did, we just got worse. But in the fourth game, we did a much better job. We defeated a really good team in Dayton because they have some really good hitters. I'm just glad we could start out the A-10 season with a win" said Kenny.

The regular season victory party didn't last long, as the Minutewomen were outplayed by the visiting Xavier Musketeers on Sunday. Despite a long bus ride, Xavier plowed into UMass, winning in four games, 15-4, 15-10, 11-15, 15-8. The Musketeers were up 6-4 when they rattled off nine straight points for the opening game victory. Game two saw Xavier take the early lead, 4-0, before UMass fought back to capture the lead at 9-6. However, the Musketeers out-gunned the Minutewomen on a 9-1 rally to put game two in the books. UM came off the ten-minute break with a back-and-forth victory in game three that saw the game tied four times before they took over at 9-9. Xavier quickly deflated UMass' hope for a comeback, as it dominated most of game four, closing it out with four consecutive points.

In lieu of the poor performance, the Minutewomen's usual suspects still posted quality numbers. Leading the pack was Hogancamp's 10 kills, 26 digs. Demarte tossed in 11 kills, 13 digs and Meyers added 14 kills, 11 digs, leaving her one dig shy of the 1,000-1,000 club.

However, Kenny is well aware that statistics do not always make the match.

"We took a big step backwards today. I never thought this team would come out unprepared to play," Kenny said. "Xavier was the team that was coming off a ten hour bus ride and a loss the night before. But we played like we were the ones with the bus trip and loss. Janeen played great last night, but I'm not going to hang a halo over her head for playing well in one match. She needs to play like that every match. We need to work on our offense in practice this week. Your not going to beat a high school team with [a .098 hitting percentage]."

The weekend results leave UM's season record at 4-5, while its conference record stands at 1-1.

The Minutewomen will look to bounce back from this home court heartbreaker with a road victory at Fairfield this Tuesday at 7pm. Coach Kenny will be seeking her 300th career win, which she narrowly missed this weekend.

UMass still had shot, in spite of lackluster effort

By Brett Mouser
Collegian Staff

VILLANOVA, PA. – Life isn't fair. We know that. You cut corners, skip steps, and put work off until all the games are over. Most of the time, the end result is all that really matters.

The world of sports does not stray far from that theory. It's the reason they play the games, just in case the mighty Casey has an off night at the plate.

If the Massachusetts football team had won on Saturday in Villanova, it would have pulled off one of the most undeserved victories of the decade. The defending national champions were beaten. They were sloppy. Their first-half performance drew a share of chuckles from the Villanova faithful on Homecoming Weekend. To say the least, the Minutemen were thoroughly outplayed.

Were these really the national champions?

With 55 seconds left on the game clock, the stadium held its collective breath, the 9,117 on hand knowing that the Minutemen must've had luck on their side to even be in a position to win.

The clock ticked down to zero and the Wildcats had escaped with a victory, defeating the Minutemen 26-21 on their home turf, but not until Aaron Weems got his paw in front of a Todd Bankhead pass on the final play of the game did Villanova stand on safe ground.

Villanova held the Minutemen (1-1) to 143 yards of total offense in the first half. UMass' offensive line had been picked apart all afternoon, yielding seven sacks. As a team, UMass turned the ball over four times and Marcel Shipp could only muster up 23 yards rushing in the first half.

Many had already handed the game to Villanova when the 'Cats went up by 21 and had the ball inside the UMass 20-yard line with a minute left in the first half. Villanova quarterback Chris Boden and the Wildcat offense were coming full steam, and the Wildcat defense had exposed the weaknesses that wrecked the UMass fandom coming into the season. There was no reason not to believe that the Minutemen were well on their way to a big loss on the road.

"They made big plays," head coach Mark Whipple said. "Chris Boden showed what kind of player he is. We more than whacked him around last year and he came back and played a great game."

Wait a second. This is UMass football, the same group of guys who had 9 of their 15 games last season decided in the final minute or overtime. Of course it wasn't over.

Middle linebacker Kole Ayi intercepted Boden's errant throw on a screen pass and all of a sudden, the Minutemen offense had a shot to get on the board before halftime. They did. UMass campus to be site of teach-in on affirmative action

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Students, faculty and staff of the University of Massachusetts are preparing for "In Defense of Affirmative Action," one of the largest campus "teach-in" lectures in recent years.

Over a dozen lectures will be held throughout a period of three days, Sept. 22, 23 and 24. Speakers include UMass professors, students, and various other experts on the subjects of affirmative action and civil liberties.

The teach-in is being held in part because of the University administration's February decision to deprioritize the use of race in its admissions policies. The change resulted in a three-to-four percent drop in the number of minority students entering the University.

The keynote speaker of the teach-in will be Randall Robinson, the President of TransAfrica, an organization that fights to achieve progressive U.S. foreign policies toward Africa and the Caribbean. Robinson will be presenting a lecture titled, "The Foreign Policy Implications of Affirmative Action."

Other notable speakers include Lurlene Munoz-Bennett, the head of desegregation for the Massachusetts Department of Education, Tom Parker, director of admissions at Amherst College, and Ted Shaw, associate director-counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People [NAACP] Legal Defense Fund, Inc.

Other aspects of the teach-in include a rally to be held on Wednesday, beginning in the Campus Center Auditorium at 6:30 p.m., and a "Student Speak-Out" on Friday, at 12:00 p.m.

"The fact is that both in terms of jobs and education, the playing field is not equal," said Associate Professor of Political Science Dean Robinson, who will be lecturing at the teach-in. "We need affirmative action policies that take that into account."

Robinson will be delivering a speech with graduate student Louis Prisock, titled, "The Assault of the Right and the Liberal Retreat From Affirmative Action." Robinson says that the lecture regards "the strategies and plans to attack affirmative action through referendums and lawsuits, as well as in the realm of public opinion."

"We hope to make a case in favor of Affirmative Action, and to educate people more broadly on the issue, so they can see it in a different light," he said.

"The changes in the admission policy seem to play into a lot of the more conservative, right-wing attacks on affirmative action," said English Professor Jenny Spencer, who helped to organize the teach-in. "We want admissions policies that will increase the number of students of color on campus."

"I think that the issue of affirmative action is the most important issue facing higher education today," she added.

Plans for the teach-in began last semester, and in June, 120 faculty members expressed support. Over the summer, a group of staff members and students have been gathering funds and speakers for the occasion. Major sponsors include the Provost's Office, numerous Deans, the Graduate Student Senate, and the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP).

Police department reports "fairly normal weekend"

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

All in all, according to both Barbara O'Connor, the Deputy Chief of the University of Massachusetts Police Department and Jeff Roy, a Lieutenant in the Amherst Police Department and the Head of the Community Policing Bureau, Amherst had a fairly average weekend.

"It was a fairly normal weekend for us, and it was pretty good," Roy said, "but that's for us, not necessarily for the other people involved."

According to Roy, whose department received a grant from the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau to crack down on alcohol offenses, the APD arrested no one in their Cops in Shops program this past weekend.

"We confiscated a half dozen ID's and checked out about 20 more after that, but we made no arrests," Roy said. Officers found more success with Speed Alcohol Prevention, making no arrests but pulling over five drivers for speeding and giving 11 more written warnings.

Part of the $7,500 grant also went towards a zero tolerance policy, and the APD also had success with that over the weekend.

According to Roy, there were five open container arrests, four possession by minors arrests, as well as four noise complaints.

"There was also a large party at 49 Hobart Lane which was broken up for both noise violations and illegal possession of a keg," Roy said.

Ryan Duffy, Christopher Ethier and Shawn Freeman, residents of the house, were all arrested. They paid $25 bail Saturday night and in court appearances today were sanctioned to RIAP (the Residential Education Alcohol Program). Police also broke up the party.

As for the UMass campus, O'Connor reported nothing major.

"We had a fairly average weekend, but we made some arrests, including putting two students into protective custody," O'Connor said. The students, who were 18 and 20, were put into protective custody.

"We arrested an individual for underage consumption of alcohol and discovered that he had a warrant on him," O'Connor said. She would not comment as to what the warrant related.

There were two more cases of graffiti, one in Baker Hall in Central Residential Area and the other at Patterson Residence Hall in Southwest Residential Area. In Baker's case, the graffiti was racial in nature and aimed at a specific individual; graffiti in Patterson was homophobic in nature.

"The graffiti in Baker was probably just the work of some copycat person," O'Connor said.

According to O'Connor, investigations into the campus graffiti, including that in Gorman, are as of yet unfinished.

"All in all, it was just another normal weekend for us," O'Connor said.

In Northampton District Court, Apollos Ihedigbo, assistant director of the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS) program at UMass, was found to be responsible for an accident last year that killed UMass student Kerry L. Hines. As a result of the conviction, Ihedigbo lost his driving privileges for life.

Kathryn F. Caserta of Waldwick, N.J., a UMass student, was given one year of probation after agreeing that there were sufficient facts to find her guilty in the death of Allison Lustig, a former UMass student.

If Caserta stays out of trouble for the next year, she will not be found guilty, but if she does stray into trouble, she will be convicted and will face a maximum of two and half years in prison.

Floyd's Wrath Cuts a Path of Pollution

By Peter S. Goodman
Washington Post

As Hurricane Floyd swept through the Chesapeake Bay, it washed as much pollution-laden sediment into creeks and rivers as normally lands over the course of a year, burying fragile oyster beds and threatening seagrasses vital for young fish and crabs, scientists say.

But scientists cautioned that the Chesapeake, a vibrant system governed by crosscurrents of natural and human forces, rarely allows for tidy calculations of harm and benefit. The storm washed pollution off the land – much of it from chicken farms that dominate the Eastern Shore – but it also flushed algae out to sea, extinguishing a cycle of fish kills wrought by oxygen shortages, and probably ending the season's threat of outbreaks of the toxic microbe Pfiesteria piscicida. The fish-killing microbe feasts on algae.

Some oysters may suffocate under layers of silt, something authorities will be watching for when they begin surveying reefs later this month in preparation for October's commercial harvest. But some oysters may have taken relief from the rains, which lowered the high salinity that encourages oyster diseases.

"So many of these organisms are affected by so many different factors throughout the year," said Robert Magnien, a water quality expert with the Maryland Department of Natural Resources. "You really have to wait until all is said and done to tally up the effects."

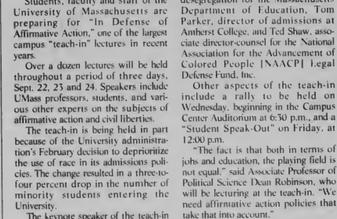
So intense was the storm, so abundant its rains, that Maryland scientists on Friday recorded the second highest flow ever on the Choptank River, a major tributary on the state's Eastern Shore.

Normally, 34 cubic feet of water slips down the Choptank every second. But a day after some nine inches of rain fell, the Choptank flowed at 6,420 cubic feet a second, according to the state's Department of Natural Resources – 189 times as much water as usual.

Donald Boesch, president of the University of Maryland's Center for Environmental Science, spent Thursday driving across the Eastern Shore.

"Let me tell you, I've never seen as much water running off the land," he said. "All of these creeks were absolutely full to the banks with turbid water. You could just see it, how much sediment was being washed off the land."

Of most immediate concern is the impact on seagrasses. Nurseries for fish and crabs, the grasses also nurture food for waterfowl.



Big storms have devastated seagrasses before. One, in August 1933, buried grasses in sediment, at a time when many already were thinning from disease.

"In seaside lagoons, where eelgrass was king, in 1934 there wasn't a speck of grass," said Robert J. Orth, a professor at the Virginia Institute of Marine Science, and a leading expert on seagrasses. "It was gone."

In 1972, Hurricane Agnes rumbled up the Atlantic and buried seagrasses in drifts of sediment. Cloudy water lingered for months. "There were huge losses of seagrasses that we've never really recovered from," Boesch said.

Flood arrived at a time of mounting concern over seagrasses. Although grass beds have grown back nicely in some areas of the Chesapeake, particularly in the lower bay where high salinity favors them, grasses in Tangier Sound – prime crabbing grounds – declined six years in a row. In May, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Bay Program announced the sound's grasses have receded 63 percent since 1992.

Whether Floyd significantly hurt seagrasses can't be known until next spring, the start of another season of growth, Orth said. Although it's reasonable to assume that some plants were washed away by wind-driven waves that hammered shallow areas, it's also possible the storm scattered seeds to places where the grasses have yet to recover, he added.

Troops arrive in East Timor, find smiles instead of gangs

By Doug Struck
Washington Post

DILI, East Timor – An uncommon quiet has come to this city.

The multinational peacekeeping force that came to put an end to savage violence found only smiles and greetings of "Hey mister" from children as they landed yesterday in the East Timorese capital.

The militia gangs that had rampaged in Dili had largely disappeared and those that remained were not threatening. The Indonesian military, whom eyewitnesses said had abetted the violence and wallowed in the looting, turned benevolent.

There was no combat on this first day of the operation. Australian and British soldiers were ferried about in trucks driven by the Indonesian military, whose allegiance to this operation was in doubt until yesterday. Indonesian soldiers and men driving in militia trucks waved at the United Nations trucks that began to wind through the streets.

"It's absolutely calm and quiet. It's been very amicable, very cordial, very friendly," said Lt. Col. Masaad Ahmad Khan, a Pakistani soldier assigned to the United Nations who had stayed in Dili throughout the siege.

The smiles belied the vicious hatreds that had ripped Dili since East Timor voted Aug. 30 to embrace independence from Indonesia. The capital has been ravaged; throughout the city the blackened smears from windows testified to wholesale torching. Homes, businesses and hotels were all looted. Many houses had also been destroyed.

Much of Dili looks like a ghost town. There were few people in the shells of houses yesterday, and only a few pedestrians pushed carts piled high with their belongings.

The port area was surrounded by a tide of weary families, still hoping to leave on troop ships or ferries, despite the arrival of the multinational force. Many said they had been waiting there for two weeks.

"They burned my house. I had no other place to go," said a young man on a bicycle. He and the others appeared to have enough to eat; several of the refugees had many bags of rice at their encampment.

The accounts of refugees who fled East Timor suggest that hundreds or thousands were killed, some of them in mass murders that eventually may become the grist for trials of crimes against humanity.

"There are many bodies that have been taken away," said a Dili woman who identified herself only as Laurentina.

And many people have fled. Zoao Sarmento, 23, a student, said he believes about 80,000 people fled the violence in Dili and have been camping in the hills.

"The situation there is terrible. Many of the children and the old people have died. There is no food, no medicine," he said.

But General Wiranto, commander of the Indonesian armed forces, told parliament yesterday that the foreign press has exaggerated the number of those killed. "The number of victims that we have recorded since the announcement of the result of the referendum is roughly in the nineties," Wiranto said.

United Nations aid workers who have begun to fan out say they believe some of the most vulnerable have died but that the situation is not yet overwhelming.

"Starvation is not the issue," said Bernard Kerblat, a U.N. worker who just returned from Dare, a rural area whose people are said to be among the neediest. "These people have developed serious coping mechanisms. They know what survival is all about," he said.

Still, Ian Martin, who is head of the United Nations Assistance Mission in East Timor said yesterday that those who fled to the hills are "hungry. There is not enough food and water and medicine."

Howe working for students' rights

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Jeff Howe, a University of Massachusetts senior, is doing double duty. Howe, a Political Science and Sociology major, is doing the job of a student – working to graduate – while also working as the Student Government Association President.

"I really wish I didn't have to go to class and could just be president," Howe said. "It certainly would be easier if that was the case."

Howe chose to run for the SGA presidency because, as he said, he had been involved before.

"I was involved with Student Senate for my first two years here, and I learned a lot about how things worked at this University," Howe said. "Last year, I was the governor for Orchard Hill, and I worked as a judicial advisor."

A judicial advisor offers advice to students without representing them in the judicial process. The judicial advisory program is jointly sponsored by the Student Government Association and the Dean of Students.

Howe's work as a judicial advisor brought him one step closer to getting involved at the highest level of student government.

"My number one issue is student rights, and I met Seth Avakian at the advisor job and we got to talking and basically, we agreed that a lot of the things at the University weren't working," Howe said.

Howe and Avakian ran together for the positions of president and student trustee last spring.

Howe's first act as president, and the majority of his work done over the summer with Avakian, was to convince the Housing Services that a letter should be distributed to all students defining student rights.

"At first, they said that they just wouldn't do that," Howe said. "So we wrote up a letter after consulting Chief Luippold [of the UMass Police] and Student Legal Services. We showed Housing Services the letter, and they then basically agreed to what we had asked."

Howe said that the response to the letter, which was distributed to the approximately 11,000 UMass students who live in on-campus housing, has been "positive."

"Both RA's at Central and at Orchard Hill have thanked us for what we've done," Howe said. "They've asked us to come over to speak to their floors or buildings about what the students can and cannot do."

Along the line of student rights, Howe is also working to restructure judicial procedures at UMass. He hopes lawyers or student advocates will become available to students facing suspension or expulsion from UMass.

"We need to allow students to have judicial advocates who are well versed in the judicial system," Howe said. "We have a jurisdiction over these things given to us by the Wellman Document." The Wellman Document is a law passed by the State Legislature giving students the right to oversee student affairs and issues.

Currently neither lawyers nor advocates are available to students who are involved in trials held on campus by the Dean of Students.

KARA STOKES/ COLLEGIAN
Jeff Howe, SGA President

Beyond issues of student rights, Howe has plans to develop campus educational programs, and look into matters of public safety and diversity.

"We're going to be doing a lot this year, but we are definitely going to be making a strong stance against hate crimes, and specifically against some of the graffiti that has appeared here on campus," Howe said. "We're going to have a week in early October that will hopefully be initiated by the programming board, where we're going to have a rally, speakers and informational handouts, and hopefully we're going to make the people who do these sorts of things realize just how illegal it can be."

The week entitled "Hate Crime Awareness Week," will begin Oct. 3 and last until Oct. 9.

According to Howe, sexist and racist graffiti showed up on campus in 10 places other than Gorman Hall.

"The week we're planning has never been done, but it needs to be because there isn't enough education on this campus," Howe said.

Howe is also going to deal with what he calls the "ongoing issue of student parking," the constant concerns for safety.

"I also want to look into the issue of diversity at the Commonwealth College," Howe said, "because right now, that situation is unacceptable and we are going to take issue with that."

Raisa Gorbachev dies of leukemia at 67

By J.Y. Smith
Special to The Washington Post

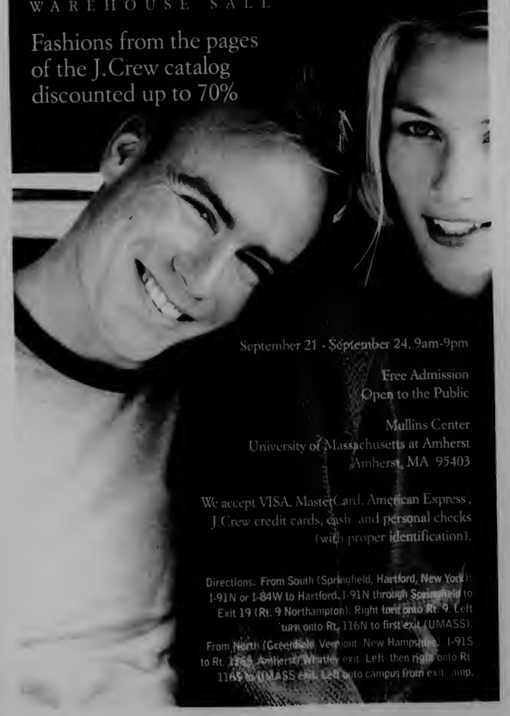
Raisa Gorbachev whose stylish, forceful, and glamorous performance as the wife of the last Soviet leader, Mikhail S. Gorbachev, made her a lightning rod for attacks on his programs of economic and political reform, died yesterday of leukemia at University Hospital in Muenster, Germany. She was 67.

Mikhail S. Gorbachev led the Soviet Union from 1985 to 1991, first as general secretary of the Communist Party and then as Soviet president. He won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1990, survived an attempted coup by communist conservatives in 1991, and resigned the presidency at the end of that year when the Soviet Union voted itself out of existence.

Mrs. Gorbachev was a presence in his life in a way that was unprecedented in the Soviet experience. She appeared with him publicly at home and abroad, served as his eyes and ears on her travels, and was one of his closest advisers. Her activities, readily accepted in the West, were much criticized in the Soviet Union.

She was practiced in diplomacy but created a minor furor during a 1987 summit between Gorbachev and President Ronald Reagan. After touring the White House with first lady Nancy Reagan, she described it as "an official house. I would say that, humanly speaking, a human being would like to live in a regular house. This is like a museum."

Mrs. Reagan was furious. In "My Turn," her memoir, she said, "It wasn't a very polite answer, especially from somebody who hadn't even seen the private living quarters."



Mrs. Reagan also said Mrs. Gorbachev was given to lecturing rather than carrying on a conversation. The alleged chill between the two first ladies was widely reported, but by all accounts they put their differences behind them.

Mrs. Gorbachev came a long way from her humble origins. She was born Raisa Maksimova Titorenky on Jan. 5, 1932, in the village of Rubtsovsk, Siberia. Her father was a railroad engineer, and she grew up in various parts of the Soviet Union.

All for one and one for all

In the ever on-going business of media, there is a problem. In the ever on-going business of college media, there is a big problem. That problem involves what gets covered, what doesn't get covered, who gets covered and who doesn't get covered.

For some papers, it's a matter of only covering the positive natures of fraternities while leaving out all of the other things that those houses do. For some papers, it's a matter of being a University shill, mentioning only the very best things about that campus. And for some papers it's not looking at what all of the students are doing, just a very small selection of usually, unfortunately, white students.

Sam Wilkinson

Apparently, this fine paper had that problem some years ago, and in responding to that, this paper created editors. This paper has a Women's Issues Editor, this paper has a Black Affairs editor, this paper has a Jewish Affairs Editor, this paper has a Multicultural Affairs Editor, and this paper has a Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Affairs Editor, among others.

Now, while the fact of the matter is that while this paper seems to be in its own little world, existing down here in the basement of the Campus Center, it is, in reality, a greater reflection on this campus as a whole.

Here at this newspaper, rather than deal with the issue that our writers weren't doing their jobs and covering the kinds of issues that spring up on a campus, this paper created editor positions. Rather than scold those who screwed up, the paper responded by creating more jobs, more hierarchy and new pages.

"If we don't have writers here who are smart enough to figure out that they should be covering issues here, let's create an editorship and then, only then, will things start changing," they might have said.

"If we don't cover the kinds of things that are going on with gay students, or female students, or black students, create an editorship and then things will start changing."

Apparently, that continued unabated, until this paper was laden with six special editors who were responsible to cover the issues of groups that had gone completely uncovered before.

And while some people think this is an acceptable solution, the fact of the matter is that it isn't. In fact, it's a lazy solution, it's a bad solution, and it's a potentially just as dangerous solution.

It's a lazy position because we, as journalists, if we can be so high and mighty to call ourselves that, are responsible for covering news. Not white news. Not male news. News.

News happens to white people, black people, gay people, straight people, men, women, yellow people, red people, and, in fact, forget all of that. News happens to people, and when journalists don't realize that, there is a problem.

But this paper didn't fire the lot of them, as it should have done. It didn't lay down a right way or the highway type ultimatum, as they should have done. It just casually accepted the deficiencies of the reporters and instead created pages where their failures wouldn't be published.

Those reporters still have the problems. They still don't cover blacks or gays or women or whomever. They still haven't learned that people are people, and news happens, without regard to race or gender or sexual orientation or anything like that: news just happens.

It's a bad decision because issues important to people aren't as powerful if they're wedged onto a fifth page in the middle of a Friday issue of the newspaper. Issues aren't as important to people when walking by the stacks of Collegians, they don't see headlines announcing the problems.

It's a dangerous decision because wedging an issue into the paper is almost as bad as not covering it. After all, why would a white male read the black issues page? Why would a black woman read the gay issues page?

Can we assume that people, out of the goodness of their hearts, will read the news of other peoples unlike them? We certainly can't safely assume it, and we might not be able to assume it all.

This paper is, however, not just a newspaper, but in our own little way, enclosed within our own little walls, we are a representation of a bigger problem on this campus.

Rather than deal with the kinds of issues that come up on a daily basis at this campus, rather than deal with the problems that this campus has had or did have, those problems have been left to fester while the people involved have been given homes or rooms or centers.

The Everywoman's Center.
The New Africa House.
The Stonewall Center.
The United Asia Learning Resource Center.

Problems are not solved through reparations, whether they're newspaper pages or houses or centers. Bad reporters are still bad reporters, whether they're publishing one-sided pieces in a paper with pages for everyone or pages for no one. In that same vein, if racists and bigots exist on this campus, and surely they do, no one is challenging them by putting the people they hate into houses that they don't have to visit.

Changing peoples' minds requires challenging peoples' minds, and wedging groups away isn't challenging peoples' minds.

This newspaper needs to strive to provide the best coverage of all of the important issues on this campus, regardless of who is involved in them. This campus needs to strive to be open to everyone, and that includes not needing a special house for this group or that group.

It includes having a campus so open that any group can feel open to be themselves on campus, and that doesn't mean having to hide behind walls, or to be wedged them. It includes knowing that the campus newspaper will provide coverage on an issue if an issue warrants coverage. It includes forcing people who may hate other people to see them and to deal with them.

But when we decide that giving somebody a page or a house is a better solution than looking problems in the face and dealing with them head-on, regardless of the difficulty of that proposition, we are going to be stuck as a newspaper, and on a larger whole, stuck as a University.

Sam Wilkinson is a Collegian staff member

What the Hell?

Well folks, just when you thought it was safe to go outside and sin, those crazy Catholics have remodeled Hell. Last Saturday, The New York Times reported that, "Catholic authorities in Rome have presented a strikingly different (and seemingly modern) picture of Hell." The first thing that struck me was that the church actually changed something. Lord knows (sorry I had to) they have had the same views on everything else that people actually care about for the last 500 or so years. Secondly, how does the Church have the authority to control Hell?

Brian Lohnes

Hell has been viewed as being a totally crappy, eternally damned, pit of flame, for as long as I can remember. Now they say that it's a, "total alienation from all that is good, hopeful and loving in the world." Sounds like Jersey to me. But seriously, that totally sucks – how is that supposed to scare anyone? I can picture the devil lounging around in a smoking jacket and slippers being bored out of his horns.

The next question; will the Catholics sub-let the old Hell? We have about 250 kids that would kill for a nice warm room. The magnitude of this decision is pretty huge – it's not like the FDA is recommending that you eat less salt every day, Hell as we know it is gone! Although this is probably a good thing for me. I have written a few things that will probably put me down there. Now I can spend my days in alienation reading and playing chess with Satan himself.

Pope John Paul II (known to his friends as "The Fonz") told a group of religious pilgrims, "more than a physical place, Hell is the state of those who freely and definitely separate themselves from God, the source of all life and joy." So here's a quick tip to all those people who don't want to go to Hell: do whatever the hell you want, tease old people, steal candy from babies, put Hashish oil in your mom's brownies... God doesn't care. All you have to do is answer the following question correctly, "Do you want to chill with God in the afterlife?" Your answer should be, and I quote, "Yes."

Surprisingly, the Church never says much about Hell. Actually, the Church never says much about anything, but you get the picture. The thoughts of revising the look and appeal of Hell have been around since the late 1960's after a big church council meeting. Several changes were made. One was to get rid of a hymn named "Dies Irae" (Day of Wrath), which was primarily used at funerals. "It's a terrifying hymn, it describes the tortures of the damned in great detail and then ends with a plea for God's mercy." Who the hell thought it was a good idea in the first place to read this at a funeral? Someone died and now you are gonna tell their family that God is gonna break their knees and shove bamboo shoots under their fingernails?! Come on people!

The article also says, "Both the Jesuit editorial and the Pope made a point of saying that Hell is real." That's a no-brainer if Hell wasn't real, what would we need church for? Guess why cigarette companies don't tell you that smoking will kill you. People will stop smoking! If Hell wasn't real, church would be emptier than Dan Quayle's head. The article goes on to say that, "In 1994 the church released the new catholic Catechism, which contains more than 700 pages explaining Catholic beliefs, but devotes only five paragraphs to Hell." Five freaking paragraphs! That's the equivalent of driving cross-country and upon arriving in California, turning around two seconds after you got there. You can't just lop the end off like that. Jeez, you figure that the guy already wrote 700 pages, what's five or ten more?

It seems really comical to me that someone, somewhere spent a good amount of time "developing" a new and improved Hell. I bet it still has the new Hell smell, and I bet no one has spilled anything on the rug yet.

Finally, the article states that, "A common illustration showed naked sinners engulfed in Satan's mouth. But such an image finds little support in Catholic theological writing these days." I know why this is. Satan now has dentures and he uses Scope to control that nasty breath he had. In today's world even the Catholic Church has wimped out, given up, and down right sold out. This bodes well for some people who will have to make their homes down there, if it's even still down. For the rest of us, remember to always answer any question that God asks you, (no matter how drunk you are) with a big, fat YES. By the way, AAA (read: triple A) rates "new Hell" with three and one half stars in its travel guide. It's only complain? The restaurant food wasn't hot enough... how's that for irony?

Honorable mention

Write for Ed/Op!

I've been thinking about honors students a lot lately. If you do happen to be an honors student, don't let that statement go to your head or anything – I've also spent a great deal of time thinking about Batman, and you pukes are no Dark Knight.

Rob Schulze

Now, I am an honors boy myself. I think we should get that right out in the open, here and now. You can call me an elitist Nazi geek bastard if you'd like, but that would just be GPA envy, and I think we all know that. (Don't worry, it's not the size – it's what you do with it.) So I speak from the perspective of one who's been through the whole honors system, and I can tell you what it means to me, then what I see it meaning to other people, and then that will maybe wind up being an eight hundred word column, and I can go play football.

The honors program means to me... very little. It's weird – I know it's out there somewhere, and I know that I'm a part of it, and every so often I get stuff in the mail from it, but I've never actually seen it. It's not like everything I do academically involves some great nerdocracy that OK's my every decision. I just add-drop like everyone else, and that's it. It doesn't require anything special out of me on a day-to-day basis, and if it does, then God help my soul because I haven't been doing it.

The only time I really had a direct experience with Honors was when I took some class in the Honors category and really hated it. I mean, the teacher was a serious Froot Loop; she wanted me to hate 'the man' and use my spare time to wipe the chins of the homeless and drooling. We watched old TV shows and commercials from 1982 and discussed how they were perpetuated by white guys in order to keep us down. Now, I'm not trying to say this was a bad class, since everyone but me was really into it (I'm not going to say that all these people had purple hair, but the percentage was high), but it just wasn't for a carefree AC/DC fan like myself. So I had to drop it.

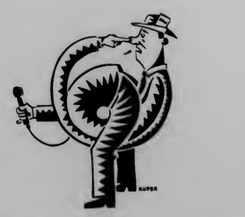
In order to do that, I had to go to an Honors Counselor and get a form. My counselor, as I remember, was a nice middle-aged woman who gave me the forms and said, "have a nice day" even though she was wearing an elegant skirt ensemble-thing, and I hadn't actually washed my jeans in several weeks. That was the sum of my experience with the mythical honors program.

I guess what I'm trying to say is that I haven't been given some solid-platinum dorm room and free range to kill minorities for sport. I'm just a regular bald guy who has to wait in line in Whitmore like the rest of you plebeians. I simply get more letters to throw away.

It's been my experience that most people in honors are just like me; simply people who don't really give much of a damn as long as their parents are happy. That's not the case entirely, though, and this is something that I mostly blame on the housing situation.

Now, it is very true that honors students are not required to live together, and that they are, in fact, given free range to circulate around campus as they please. However, for me, at least, it was strongly advised during pre-freshman orientation that we choose to live on an honors floor, or at least with another honors student. Very strongly advised, in fact. Now, you probably say to yourself "Very strongly advised? So what?" Ah, you fool. You do not know the mind of the honors student.

One does not become an honors student by exercising independent thought and doing whatever the hell you want. That is how one becomes a convicted felon. You become an honors student by doing everything every single one of you teachers ever said to you, and doing it exactly the way they wanted you to. High school teachers don't want crazy originality and learning about the things that interest you; what high school teachers want is for you to tell them things that they already know so they can give you an "A" and go to bed early. So your average pre-frosh honors student is basically a well-educated, intelligent, and hardworking mindless sheep. When someone is a position of authority advises him to do something, it's kind of a foregone conclusion.



I don't like this. I have heard unfounded rumors (which, in the proud journalistic tradition of today, I am happy to pass on to you) of honors student floor sides waging cold wars against the other, non-honors side, and that sucks. I never lived on the honors floor myself (my GPA isn't quite high enough to qualify me for sheepdom) and you really couldn't force me to. Elitism I don't have a problem with, but segregation I do. That basically ensures that you only really get to know people just like you, that you don't have to opportunity to really broaden your horizons in a collegiate environment.

If it hadn't been for certain non-honors students on the floor my freshman year, I never would have realized the benefits of binge drinking and cutting classes because it's "too nice out." You can read all the books by dead guys that you want – if you can't appreciate the opportunity of living with people that aren't carbon copies of yourself, you're pretty frickin' dumb. (Yeah, wassup, 7 Dickinson!)

As this column winds its way down, it strikes me that I have no real point to make here. Of course, if you've read this column before that probably doesn't surprise you. I guess I just want it to be known that, yeah, the honors system does have its flaws, but no, it isn't some grand conspiracy out to conquer UMass; it is, however, a beautiful day for football.

Better Than Ezra surprised Hartford audiences last Friday night at The Webster.

Better Than Ever

BETTER THAN EZRA
The Webster
Sept. 17

A crazy, energized, light extravaganza is the only concise way to describe last nights Better Than Ezra concert at the Webster Theatre in Hartford, Connecticut. Along with opener Jeremy Toback, Better Than Ezra had the house rockin' as all 600 attendees had expected from this hit wonder trio.

After a late start, the much-heralded threesome arrived onstage at 10:15 to begin their 15-song set that blew away the Hartford fans. Playing all of their HUGE radio hits, with some lesser known scattered in between, this veteran band lived up to expectations. Singer/songwriter/guitarist Kevin Griffin led the way, as always, with a humorous and full-blown effort. Entering stage dressed as the Statue of Liberty, Griffin in gown and crown, proceeded to light the arms of candles surrounding the stage. Bathed in blue lights and bass-laden trance/techno, he "sparked the inferno". Starting with "Return of P.M.", the band next moved into familiar ground with a charged version of their song, "GOOD".

Coming into the third song Kevin introduced his fellow Ezra band mates, Tom Drummond on the five string bass, and Travis McNabb on drums. Playing off each other as if they have been touring for decades, the band rode the crowd's excitement to a wild live rendition of "King of New Orleans". This song, based off their hometown of New Orleans, let the band "Break it on Down" as Griffin put it, to slow down and jam, while he gave a brief and entertaining monologue.

Next Better than Ezra delved into their X-Files soundtrack contribution, "One More Murder", with an eclectic blend of synthesizers and distortion pedals to knock the house down. They furthered the wonderment with their performances of "Rosealia", and "At the Stars", along with a mid-song dance contest. Calling four fans to join them on stage, two girls, and two guys strutted their stuff for a Better Than Ezra prize pack, with a man named Ross rising to victory. Ending their set with an amazing performance of their blistering radio hit, they left the crowd "Desperately Wanting" more.

Quickly returning for the encore, the comedic band, dabbled with three abbreviated versions of "Lean on Me", "Party like it's 1999", and Sinead O'Connor's "Nothing Compares to You". Better than Ezra then appeased the fans with two more songs finishing with the wonderfully hyotic slower paced jam "Porcelain". Pumped, all of the fans left the Webster with a wonderful performance under their belts.

Leading off after an hour and forty five-minute delay, Jeremy Toback got the night going with his singular performance. A wonderful singer/songwriter, and creator of radio hit "You Make Me Feel", Jeremy gave the fans an astounding 11 song set. Once a member of the band "Braid", Jeremy's solo guitar playing and singing was a wonderful combination. Reminiscent of a young James Taylor, and a voice quite similar to the popular Shawn Mullins, Toback worked his 6-string Guild acoustic all night long. With a great stage presence, and fluid movements behind the mic, Jeremy sang a wide variety of tunes, including a cover of the Beatles, "All You Need is Love". Jeremy Toback is definitely a name to remember in the up and coming folk/pop scene.

Other than the fact that the band was great, the venue itself is a pretty cool place. To quote a patron, who goes by the title "Rosco," "This place reminds me of a bowling alley." And in a weird sort of way it does, but it is a very wild place to see a concert. With a dance floor about 2/3 the size of Pearl Street in our very own Northhampton, a large seating area, and numerous bars, the Webster has its own identity in the rock concert world. Letting The Net Work For You

By Adam Martignetti

In an effort to make this more readable and more like a weekly column, which I intend it to be, I'm going to start picking one interesting site a week that I come across during my Internet travels. So without further adieu...

The Internet site of the Week: http://30hyos.com The web's second most used search engine has posted a tool that I find quite interesting. This site is a list of the top 50 Web searches on Excite for the entire week. In other words it's a pretty good reflection of what web-surfers are interested in. The topics range from Anna Kournikova (#29) to Limp Bizkit (#44) to The WWF (#6). By clicking any of the various topics, you can bring up the results for each particular search.

The top five searches for the week ending September 12th were 1) Pokemon (more people surfing than watching the program), 2) Britney Spears (Almost UMass' pop princess), 3) Football (Couch potatoes have been waiting since January), 4) Pamela Anderson (a.k.a. Blockbuster), 5) Dragonball Z (like Pokemon...I think).

Business Week, Internet World and The Industry Standard magazines this week released lists of the people and companies driving development of the Internet. One of the big surprises of The Industry Standard's list was the unproven, home grocery delivery company, Webvan and its founder Louis Borders. Internet World's list, which is ranked according to revenue generated, puts old favorites AOL, Amazon.com, and I-Group (etrade.com) at the top of their list.

In an announcement that comes as absolutely no surprise to anyone, Amazon.com, EBay and Priceline.com were picked as the three best places on the Web to save money, according to research by Princeton, N.J.-based Opinion Research. The results were released by Priceline.com, which seems to be a bit sketchy. Opinion Research projects that 42.1 million adults have bought something online this year. The Opinion Research study, conducted over two weekends in June and August, sampled 2,004 U.S. adults. Amazon.com was rated the best place for saving money when shopping the Web by 24 percent of the respondents. On the subject of savings on so-called big-ticket items, Priceline was tops, chosen by 14 percent.

BMG, which owns RCA Records, said that it will offer live recordings of performances by the Dave Matthews Band over the Internet as secure digital downloads exclusively through Liquid Audio. Four live songs from the band's September 11th show — recorded but not aired as part of a PBS special — will be offered for preview or purchase starting Sept. 29 at http://www.liquidaudio.com/dmb. Each of the four songs will have a suggested retail price of $3.49, but will be bundled in "buy one, get one free" offers.

Nowadays, we have virtual everything, so why not virtual hard drives? Don't laugh, it's happening. i-drive.com, the Internet drive company, today launched "i-Link", a new service that allows users to link their homepages directly to the contents of their i-drive shared folders. These folders can hold all types of files, including PDF, MP3, JPEG and MOV. With i-Link, visitors to a particular site will be able to download or send any file directly to and from the site's i-drive account. Link is free and can hold up to 25 MB of information.

NBC Internet recently announced that they are teaming with ValueVision in an effort to become the cable home shopping network. In conjunction with ValueVision, NBC will create SnapTV and an e-commerce site called SnapTV.com. The effort shows the continuing trend toward convergence, bringing together home shopping, Internet shopping and direct e-commerce.

If you're looking for less conventional shopping methods, check out Netmarket.com or Hugglezone.com, where customers can actually "haggle" with electronically created merchants in an effort to get lower prices.

Also, check out DealPilot.com, which is a site that provides a comparison-shopping service on the Internet, allowing visitors to find the best offer for books, CDs, videos or DVDs from major online retailers.

Perhaps, the most exciting news though comes from Amazon.com, who is beginning to sell custom designed, brand named bags. Oh boy!! To pick up your bag, hurry to Amazon.com/bags while supplies last.

CBS Evening News anchor Dan Rather will deliver a simultaneous keynote address to the audiences of two Internet meetings, Ad Tech and EHealthcareWorld. His speech, entitled, "The Internet: A News Revolution," will consider cultural, social and economic themes related to the impact of the Internet. The conference will be held on Nov. 3, 1999 at the New York Hilton Towers.

Broadband is coming... finally and AT&T hopes they'll be one of the largest providers. AT&T announced that it will extend broadband services to businesses by offering cable-TV delivered (thanks to their acquisition of TCI) Internet. Offering service in 17 markets now, AT&T will provide small office/home office single-user access for $59 to $79 monthly, depending on the speed of service desired. Markets included will be in select areas of the Chicago, Dallas, Denver, Portland, San Francisco and Seattle.

Lastly, Visa has announced the launch of an Internet unit Evisa in hopes of raising more e-commerce revenue. Welcome to the '90s. Apparently, they're not everywhere you want them to be.

Until next week, keep your eyes open and your hand glued to your mouse.

The 'Yellow Submarine' Resurfaces

By Roger Catlin
The Hartford Courant

A few weeks after the 1966 release of "Yellow Submarine," a fanciful children's song sung by Ringo Starr from the album "Revolver," the producer of the cheesy Beatles' cartoon show had a proposal.

Why not make the song, the producer suggested, into a full-length animated movie?

Already Yellow Submarine" was one of the band's most controversial songs.

The year after that song came out, I think it was voted the most popular and the most hated song in Britain," says George Harrison in recent comments issued with the release this week of the "Yellow Submarine" home video and "songtrack."

The Beatles reportedly loathed the "Beatles" cartoon show, on which they chased around bulls named Honey Don't." And they didn't have much hope in the producer's idea to turn "Yellow Submarine" into a full-length movie, but they also didn't want to shoot a third live-action film to fulfill their obligation to United Artists.

A number of scripts and an arresting, colorful visual approach helped sell their manager, Brian Epstein. The Beatles agreed to provide four new songs to a soundtrack that would otherwise be filled with previous Beatles recordings. There was no time to do more. The band was intensely busy, polishing off "Sgt Pepper's Lonely Heart's Club Band," all the while planning "Magical Mystery Tour," traveling to India and beginning to record the songs that would end up on the White Album.

Only Paul McCartney read the script; none lent their voices to their characters. The producers asked brushstrokes (for "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds"). The band's utopian songs were a perfect fit with "All You Need Is Love" the fitting finale.

The idea of the movie was based on a Beatles TV cartoon they had done, and we hadn't done the voices for that," McCartney says.

Plus it's a lot of hard work and we were working on our music at the time, and we didn't want to become actors – it wasn't our thing. So they got Liverpool actors to do our voices."

McCartney says the exaggerated deadpan of the actors looked people into an "idea that Liverpool people speak in this daft way."

"Everybody seems to be talking as if they're on Mars," Starr said.

The fanciful story, with its Blue Meanies, Snapping Turtle Turks, Apple Bonkers and Flying Gloves was brightly colored in a mod style of the time that also had an innovative use of still photographs (in the "Eleanor Rigby" montage) and free-style brushstrokes (for "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds"). The band's utopian songs were a perfect fit with "All You Need Is Love" the fitting finale.

The Bronx Universe

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

Keeping with their outstanding effort to introduce unconventional performances to the five-college community, the New World Theatre presented Universes this weekend in Bowker Auditorium. Universes, comprised of five young Bronx natives, addresses ubiquitous issues through an urban perception in a novel fusion of spoken word poetry, hip-hop, jazz, tribal percussion, dance, and comedy.

Universes' latest endeavor "(Fresh Out the Box opens with some of the more expected standards of performance art. They skirted around saying anything with real substance and instead exerted their focus on creating thoughtful stage pictures peppered with humorously intended (though directionless in their "abstract nature") dialogue. To see only the first twenty-five minutes of this show, an audience member would interpret little more than an unnecessary masturbation theme produced by a group of artists who very clearly wanted to impress something important but forgot to try. The initial scenes were too long, too ambitiously dramatic, and all fell too short of their plans.

However, it was impossible to ignore the absolute soul in an original acapella song performed by the group's only female performer Mildred Ruiz in memory of a grandmother. Ruiz' vocals, throughout the show, were enormously emotional, consistently overwhelming in their energy, and undoubtedly the most memorable aspect of the entire evening.

From those few moments of the most sincere man-made music, Universes forced the crowd to imbibe life and into an open-minded willingness to listen to whatever they cared to express. With an appeal to our most primal senses, Universes revealed the audience's complacency about issues irrelevant to their own lives and made one concerned, and glad to be. The audience came to care about where the artists came from and the stories they wished to tell. It was the type of transition that occurs unconsciously with effects that are easily observed. For the remainder of the show Universes' messages were received with nothing less than eager anticipation.

Although at times an amateur familiarity with the stage was obvious, the performers maintained earnestness in their unique attempts to establish a point. For example, one skit began working in the confines of cheesiness (the cast assumed the roles of city kids cruising and getting high in a pimped up van) but resulted in five distinct and effective interpretations of the events of the night. The different reactions varied from memoirs of a cousin's suicide, to racism, to first love, to coming of age.

Sensitivity of emotion and social critique was rather equally balanced in the show. Reality about life in the projects, abuse in prisons, with particular attention paid to the NYPD's tendency to exploit their authority, was uttered through very contemporary and accessible monologues that included traditions of rap.

Universes deserve collective credit for their ensemble work. Raw talent and painstaking rehearsals must have been prerequisites to flawlessly execute ninety minutes of nothing but their voices, their words, and their rhythm. In a time when the most heralded form of theatre involves million dollar sets, endless orchestras, and the flash of special effects, it is doubly impressive for five people to enter a bare stage with nothing but their uniform costumes and themselves to successfully convey insight.

Universes' creates the sensation for their viewers that they've just participated in a real and momentous event and allows them to leave with a feeling that they now know a little more about a world outside their own. Something new is always worthwhile. Something new that challenges your ideals, like Universes, is not only time well spent, but also rewarding.

Boston Quartet Comes to UMass

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

As an opener to their season, The Fine Arts Center Series will present a world premiere of Lee Hyla work performed by the Lydian String Quartet this Wednesday night at 7:30 in Bowker Auditorium. The program will also include Mozart's String Quartet No. 19 in C, K465 ("Dissonance"), and Ravel's String Quartet in F.

The Lydian String Quartet includes Daniel Stepner (violin), Judith Eisenberg (violin), Mary Ruth Ray (viola), and Rhonda Rider (cello). The group is based at Brandeis University but has traveled and received international acclaim. Boston Globe's Michael Manning says of them: "it's especially satisfying when a group of locally grown performers clearly meets the uncompromised standards of musicianship and professionalism."

Tickets are available at the Box Office located in Bowker or by phone: 413.545.2511.

Mining Hip Hop's Inner Mantel

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

All right already. I'll decease from my onslaught of negativity. As my second grade teacher once professed, "if I don't have something nice to say, I shouldn't say it." In the case of hip-hop, perhaps we are merely experiencing a Depression. Things are a bit tight right now as our portions of nutritious rhymes and hearty beats have been carefully parceled out. However, those of us who are essentially starving for true hip-hop can find sufficient food if we dig. And I mean rigorously mine hip-hop's inner mantel, scour its core and comb its crust. The truth is out there. Here is some of the loot from my excavation.

First off, I'd like to officially recognize the highly underrated Xzibit of L.A.'s Likwit Crew. After two stellar but-not-classic albums, X-to-the-Z has been (like a fine 'wino') steadily improving with age. His guest verses on Defari's "Likwit Connection," Prince Paul's "Handle Your Time," Snoop's "Bitch Please" and Shabaam Sahdeeq's "Concrete", have certainly fortified his potency if not elevated him into the lyrically elite.

In the subject of West Coast lyricism, Rass Kass is conceivably the most predominate emcee that comes to mind. Recently, the Golden State Warrior has completed a move to New York whereupon he immediately dropped two singles, "Oral Sex" produced by Da Beatminerz, and "Dreams Too" produced by Doo Wop. While both are lyrically vicious, the latter, a controversial assault on R&B singers (reminiscent of Biggie's "Dreams"), has Rass in a pool of hot water. Sticking with the scrubs vs. pigeons battle theme, he uses 702's hook "Where My Girls At" (but flips it differently) as he spares absolutely no one and holds nothing back...nothing. Welcome to the Big Apple.

Since his untimely death in February, Big I material has become a commodity of the most scorching magnitude. Similar to Biggie and Tupac, I.'s rhymes have become immortalized and hearing them will forever elicit chills. Supposedly Rawkus Records has plans to release the unfinished LP he was working on, "Chicago Thoughts" and the brilliant "Connection" have wet our appetites for another full-length which is somewhere on the horizon. Once again beats will be provided by Premier, Show & AG, Diamond and Buckwild; but what is even more intriguing is the rumor that the Crooklyn Dodgers (O.C., Masta Ace, Special Ed, Jeru, Chubb Rock and Buckshot) will re-team to record a couple of tracks for the LP. Even though it's early, I smell a classic brewing.

Although it took awhile, I finally warmed up to Pharaoh Monch's self produced "Simon Says" and Phife Dawg's inaugural solo, "Bend Over." Although each joint secretes a fairly typical cognac-party-rap feeling, both retain rugged, liquored-up anthem status for the club thugs.

Lastly, out of the production department, the Alchemist has finally emerged. Having built his resume producing tracks for Swollen Members, Casual, Severe Hi and the Mighty Inspectah Deck, Mobb Deep, Shabaam Sahdeeq, Group Home and Terror Squad, he is on the brink of a revered notoriety in the world of beat making. Armed with an array of skills, versatility and consistency, the Alchemist is fully prepared to bring new school production and talk-it into the new millennium.

That's all for now but make sure you optically gravitate in this direction on Tuesdays for more. Or in other words, stay tuned.

Floyd sits UMass

By Matt Seifert
Collegian Correspondent

Last Friday, the Massachusetts women's tennis team expected to venture to West Point, New York to take on the likes of Army, Fordham, Howard University, and Seton Hall. All of which, on paper looked to be pretty good competition for the Minutewomen. However, the squad did not expect their toughest opponent to be the weather.

Hurricane Floyd rolled in and proved to be the toughest foe for the Minutewomen, causing the team to have to withdraw from a tournament in which they were favored despite the play of the aforementioned competition.

As disappointing as pulling out of a tournament in which you are favored may sound, the Minutewomen could do nothing to stop the torrential storm.

But every cloud does, in fact, have a silver lining. The lining in this case was the fact that the squad had some time to rest before returning home for their first dual match of the season against Amherst College, which will be held today at 3:30pm on the upper Boyden tennis courts.

The Maroon and White have had plenty of time to rest this season, with their last match being on September 12 at the Syracuse Invitational, which was hosted by Orangewomen.

The results of that tournament were somewhat mixed with the strongest play coming from the doubles pair of sophomore Helena Horak and freshman sensation Katie Stammen. The duo trounced their opponents en route to a third place finish in the flight two doubles.

Squads such as Temple, Syracuse, and Boston University all competed in what many considered the top tournament in women's tennis.

The Syracuse Invitational offered something the team could never get in practice, experience. The match gave the team battle readiness, something that needs not to be underestimated when you have three freshmen in the lineup.

Amherst College should be a difficult opponent for the Minutewomen, with the Lady Jeffs being the defending Division III national champions. Amherst is coming off a devastating victory over Trinity, whom they trounced 8-1.

However, for being a defending national champion the Lady Jeffs have a fair amount of inexperience on their squad. Of the thirteen-member squad six are freshmen.

The Lady Jeffs will look for leadership from their co-captains Pamela Diamond and Neely Steinberg, both of whom are seniors.

Coach Judy Dixon will look for senior Ola Gerasimova, sophomore Annie Hamilton, Horak and Stammen to post wins in singles competition singles. While in doubles action, she will likely send the tandem of junior Robyn Lebovitz and freshman Beth Ebert to the court together. The duo of April Madani and Lauren Perry are the probable combatants in the other doubles competition.

Defending champs tumble to 0-2

By T.J. Simers
Los Angeles Times

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two games, two defeats into 1999 and the World Champs have become overnight chumps. The Denver Broncos can no longer stop anyone, giving up an average of 345 yards per game.

They cannot score; the same team that averaged more than 31 points a year ago is now posting little more than 15 on the average. And they cannot win, tumbling Sunday to the Kansas City Chiefs, 26-10, before 78,665 in Arrowhead Stadium.

Consider the depths to which the Broncos have plunged. At the rate they are going, the AFC West Division first-place San Diego Chargers will finish with a better record than the defending Super Bowl champions.

The Chiefs, pegged by most to finish no better than third in the woeful AFC West, couldn't beat the anemic Bears a week ago. And at the start of this game, their hometown fans were booing their own quarterback, Elvis Grbac, who ain't nothing but a hound dog in this city.

But Kansas City not only whomped the Broncos, it did so showing no respect, playing a traditional defense against Denver rather than stacking the line to slow down Terrell Davis, the NFL's most valuable player last season.

"Not very many teams have played the last couple of years with seven men up front and stopped the run the way they did," Denver Coach Mike Shanahan said. "They just did the job with a four-man rush."

How the mighty have fallen.

who, along with Kain and Slingluff, provided all the offense UMass needed. Troups, O'Neill and sophomores Lutz, and Ramos each added one point to the win.

Huntles again posted a strong performance in net with 10 saves. The win brought UMass to 14-3 all time record against St. Francis.

Next weekend the Minutemen return to the water when they travel down to Kings Point, New York and the US Merchant Marine Academy to participate in a CWPA League Tournament.

UMass will start off the tournament facing the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy at noon on Saturday September 25, followed by Hofstra College at 4:00 pm on the same day. They will then conclude the tournament at 10:00 am on Sunday facing arch-rival Fordham squad.

A wet weekend.

Ryder Cup Play for cash?

By Jeff Jacobs
The Hartford Courant

Forget "Rocky," "Hoosiers" or even "Tin Cup." Captain Ben Crenshaw should gather Tiger Woods, David Duval and the rest of the U.S. Ryder Cup squad in his hotel suite Thursday night to watch the first 30 minutes of "Saving Private Ryan."

Watch some scared 18-year-old kid wet his pants.

Watch his seasick buddy blow lunch.

Watch the guy next to him praying to Sweet Jesus.

Watch the guy next to him take a bullet through the forehead.

Watch 'em squirm and die on Omaha Beach.

Then, Crenshaw ought to stop the VCR, flick on the lights and ask Duval what part didn't he understand. Ask Tiger and his buddy, Mark O'Meara, if they want to keep bitching about only receiving five grand in expenses to represent their country.

There is no greater enemy of the reactionary than the vast gray area of detail. There is no more formidable opponent of an inflexible thinker than the careful presentation of counterpoints. Debate and diplomacy usually cool the fire, smooth the rough edges of blustery verse.

Yet after two months of consideration, two months of deft verbal hi-jinks by some of our nation's premier golfers, I have grown more rigid on the Ryder Cup controversy. Not less.

I am not satiated by the fact that a truce has been called with the PGA of America. I never want to hear Tiger or Duval or another multimillionaire golfer argue about Ryder Cup play-for-pay or charity designation again. Ever. Period.

They should forever shut up and collect $12.50 each for the duty. That's about how much Henry Masiuk of West Hartford and Adrien Gagnon of Manchester got a week to fight in World War II. That's how much those boys who charged onto the beach at Normandy got paid.

"I'm lucky I'm here today, that's all I can say," said Masiuk, 76, who served in the Pacific for the Navy. "When these athletes already have made millions, why can't they just play for their country?"

Masiuk was fighting in Saipan the day of the Great Circus Fire in Hartford. He remembers the Army boys eating franks and beans and thinking it was a feast. Rest assured, the Ryder Cup army will be eating filet mignon in Brookline this week.

"They're getting expense money. They're getting all the glory of playing for our country and all this exposure for their sponsors. If that's not enough, tell 'em to stay home," said Gagnon, 73, a Navy veteran who also fought in Korea. "Some of these guys would rather wear the Nike sign than the American flag."

Sports rocks!!

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – A surprise victory can be yours today, but you don't want to get carried away with yourself. Self-control is essential even when you win!

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Brush up on those skills that have been lying dormant in the past, as you are likely to be called upon to do what you used to do best.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Don't assume that those around you know what you are up to. Explain yourself when necessary in order to see that all goes smoothly.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Now is not the time to change what's been working for you in the past days, weeks, or months. If it doesn't need to be fixed, leave it alone!

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 10) – This is a good day to modify your methods and motives. You can adopt new tactics, which will win you greater results when the chips are down.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – This is a good day to reexamine your priorities, and to try and align yourself more accurately with a loved one if necessary.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) – Your preference may be for simplicity and straightforward efforts, but you're in for something a little more complex and convoluted today.

Aries (March 20-April 19) – Don't settle for anything less than you know you can achieve today. Once you say "that's enough" when it isn't, you will begin to decline.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) – You don't want to make even the most minor error at the wrong time today. Take care that you know exactly what you are doing.

Gemini (May 21-June 20) – You must be sure that you avoid the ideological traps today that all aggressively opinionated people can fall into. Listen as well as talk.

Cancer (June 21-July 22) – You'll appreciate being busier than expected today, as it gives you a reason to put off dealing with a highly stressful personal dilemma.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) – A disagreement over fashion and style is likely to erupt today at home. Now is the time for you to offer that compromise that all can live with.

Field hockey drops heartbreaker to eighth-ranked JMU Dukes, 1-0

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

The voice of once-mighty Floyd had faded from a tropical roar to a soggy whimper by the time the Massachusetts field hockey team took the turf Saturday. Like the survivors on the storm-torn Carolina coast, the No. 19 Minutewomen were trying to put it all back together, after a disheartening 7-0 loss to Maryland the previous weekend.

Blocking UM's return to respectability was No. 8 James Madison, who's Dukes had opened the '99 slate with convincing wins over big-name programs Michigan and Duke. This game marked the last of five straight home dates with which the Maroon and White opened this year's campaign, before taking to the road for wars with North Carolina and the Blue Devils.

Can a must-win game come this soon, a mere five games into the season?

"It's too early in the season to look at end results," said UM Coach Patty Shea, whose troops dropped an emotionally draining 1-0 contest to JMU. "You look to try and grow with every single game that you play."

The difference in ranking appeared to be a very minor detail to the Minutewomen, who came out charging against JMU with immediate pressure on both sides of the ball. Co-captain Lucy Koch blew past a trio of Duke defenders on the Maroon and White's first possession and nearly got off a shot, only to have the ball swept clear by JMU back Whitney Diebolt.

The first 15 minutes of play saw a wicked seesaw battle between the teams' midfielders, with neither squad able to key clean transitions after turnovers. UM back Kerry Ann Jaggassar played as if possessed, shutting down JMU's vaunted forward duo of Julie Weiss and Valerie Cohen with her relentless pursuit and attack-style stickwork. Senior All-American Lindsay Hunter and the rest of the JMU backfield proved equally driven, smashing any sort of UM rhythm by jamming the passing lanes.

"We had a lot of trouble with our positioning in the first half," Shea said. "We had too many opportunities where we got caught up behind the defenders, and you can't get the ball from there."

With neither team able to put together much offensive flow, the early goings turned into a battle of simply maintaining possession and creating opportunities. The Minutewomen saw a pair of sideline chances evaporate amidst defensive pressure from the Dukes, as UM's Patty Robinson and Jill Fantasia coughed up the ball while trying to key breakaways.

"We tried to do way too much individually out there today," Shea said. "Instead of using each other, we tried to take it one-on-one too many times, and it cost us."

The second of these turnovers would prove to be the Massachusetts' undoing, as the ensuing odd-man rush by JMU led to a frenzy of action in front of the UM goal that effectively screened keeper Zowie Tucker. Junior forward Julie Martinez, third on the JMU squad in points with eight, gathered in the loose ball and flicked a soft wrister to teammate Jill Novosad, who cranked a turf-rocket past Tucker into the back of the net.

With less than two minutes until halftime, the Dukes had drawn first blood. And if the game's style thus far was any indication, that goal looked like more than enough offense to spell a win.

"With the score one-nil, the game takes on a whole different meaning," Shea said. "You really have to start taking it to them."

Shea and assistant Hilary Rose went back to the drawing board at halftime, fine tuning the Maroon and White so as to avoid another offensive debacle in the second half. The difference was immediately clear, as UMass charged into the final 35:00 with renewed enthusiasm and aggression.

Forward Kristen Schmidt seemed poised to explode offensively, twice taking the ball single-handedly through the Duke defense without finding the net. Forwards Nicole Bardell and Lindsay Abbot also provided nasty penetration for the Minutewomen.

"We played better in the second half, simply by possessing the ball," Shea said. "There were times out there that we played brilliantly."

Fellow forward Tamra Geryk also came up huge for the Minutewomen, sending JMU keeper Amanda Latz sprawling to the turf twice and setting up two of UMass' five second-half penalty corners.

But despite the best efforts of UM corner-goal specialist Anke Bruemmer, the Maroon and White simply couldn't convert on any of the five chances. Credit both Latz and the JMU backs, who swarmed fearlessly in front of their goal on every shot.

"Mandy's quick, powerful, and intense; she [played] a key role in our powerful defense," said JMU Coach Christy Morgan. "Great teams start with great defense."

As the seconds waned a feeling of desperation seemed to grip UMass, as it scrambled for the equalizing goal by any means necessary. JMU handled the pressure like a ranked team should, as a nifty between-the-legs pass from Hunter to Martinez in the final ticks epitomized the Dukes' composure and control at the game's end.

Tucker tallied six saves for UMass in the loss, which lowered the Maroon and White's record to 2-3 and subsequently dropped the team from the national rankings.

"At this point in the season, we're trying to learn something from every game. It's all about the learning process," Shea said. "If you take care of the process, the end results will take care of themselves."

The team now hits the road for games at North Carolina and Duke on September 25th and 26th, respectively.

Water Polo wins 2 out of 3

The No. 12 ranked Massachusetts men's water polo squad improved to 9-2 this weekend at the DeNunzio Pool on the campus of Princeton University while participating in the Princeton Invitational Tournament.

To the dismay of Coach Russ Yarworth, the tournament didn't begin as planned. In Saturday morning's opening game, the Minutemen were handed an 11-9 loss by the host, the No. 17 Princeton Tigers. The Maroon and White put up a tough fight, ending the first half even at 6-6.

Princeton came out strong in the second half, scoring two straight goals to open the third quarter, and UMass never recovered from the onslaught of the Tigers.

The Minutemen were led by senior co-captain Richard Huntley, who made eight saves in goal. Senior Pat Kain netted three goals while senior Rich Slinglulff added two in a valiant effort against the Tigers.

Also adding to the Maroon and White's effort were sophomores Mike Foley, Carlos Ramos and Greg Trayer, who, along with senior Timmy Troupis, combined for the Minutemen's nine goals. With the loss, UMass' all-time record against Princeton now falls to 9-3.

The day brightened later on that afternoon as Massachusetts handed Johns Hopkins a 9-3 defeat. Foley led the offensive with two goals, while fellow sophomore Evan Lutz added two of his own.

Contributing to the UMass win were freshmen Ricardo Puig, sophomore Antonio Maldonado, junior Brook O'Neill and seniors Rich Slinglulff and Scott Stevens, each adding one goal for the Minutemen.

The superb goaltending skills of Huntley, who had three saves in the first half, led the UMass defense.

The All-American was then replaced by freshman back-up goalie Rafael Santana in the second half. Santana posted a solid performance with six saves to close out the game. The Minutemen continue their undefeated record against the Blue Jays, bringing their record to 3-0 all time.

On Sunday morning, the Massachusetts squad avenged their 12-7 loss to St. Francis at the Navy Invitational Tournament by defeating the No. 11 ranked Terriers 10-8.

UM to face the 12-0 Stags

By Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team will be trying to give Coach Bonnie Kenny her 300th career win tonight against an undefeated Fairfield University team (12-0).

The Minutewomen (4-5, 1-1 Atlantic 10) are looking to rebound after splitting a pair this weekend against A-10 foes Dayton and Xavier. They convincingly beat a solid Flyer squad before falling to the Musketeers.

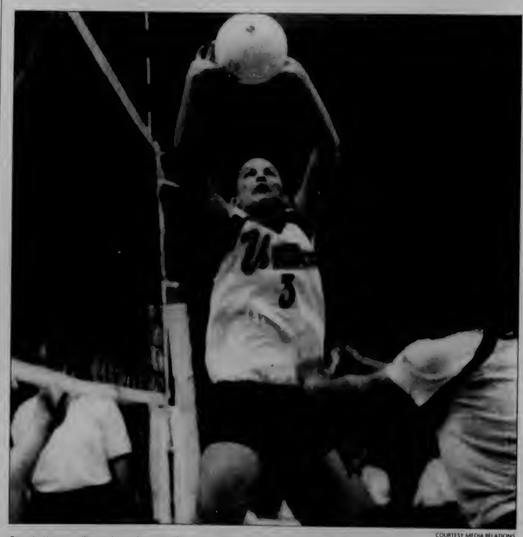
The Stags are off to the best start in school history, beating out last season's start of 8-0. Most recently, Fairfield went 4-0, winning their own tournament, the Fairfield Fall Classic.

Fairfield boasts a standout freshman in Aileen Presiado who posted four double-digit kill efforts, including two 20-plus kill matches, to win MVP honors for the tournament. The six-foot outside hitter, Presiado claimed MAAC Volleyball Player of the Week honors and ranks fourth in the Conference with a .313 hitting percentage.

UMass will also have to contain sophomore setter Meghan Mahaffy and junior outside hitter Corrine Carlson. Mahaffy joined Presiado on the All-Tournament team and has been averaging 7.267 assists per game. Carlson leads the team in digs per game and is second with 2.96 kills per game.

But those aren't the only problems for the Minutewomen. Sophomore Joanne Saunders, a 6-2 middle blocker leads the team in kills with 4.72 per game, and senior setter Liz Bowers leads the Stags in assists with 11.44 a contest.

UMass must improve on their offense, which has been averaging a low hitting percentage at .172 prior to the past weekend's action, while their opponents averaged .186. UM will expect their two seniors Jill Meyers and Kari Hogancamp to keep up their strong offensive play.



Meyers leads the team in kills with 4.06 a game, while Hogancamp ranks second on the team with an average of 3.25 a game. The play of the Minutewomen seems to flow with the offensive play of sophomore Janeen Demartle, as her hitting percentage is a paltry .029 in the five losses, while her percentage skyrockets to .277 in the team's four wins.

One question will be whether or not coach Kenny will stick with sophomore setter Heather Holtsberg or junior Jennifer Drennan. Holtsberg was taken out of the last game against Xavier due to what Kenny called, "atrocious play." Drennan, who normally serves for Rebecca Hasson was her replacement. Holtsberg averaging 11.43 assists per game must bounce back and give a solid performance for the Minutewomen to win.

Defensively, UMass will continue their well-rounded performance through Hogancamp and Meyers who both average 4.58 digs and 3.06 digs per game respectively. Meyers will be undoubtedly become the fourth player in UMass history to record 1,000 kills and 1,000 digs in a career, needing only one more dig to join the club.

The Minutewomen have shown their defensive ability throughout the year, tallying 349 digs on the season to their opponents 336 digs. Middle blocker Hasson is the only blocking force on the team, averaging 1.00 block per game, while the team averages 1.78 per game.

"We are playing a very good team which certainly knows how to win," Kenny said. "They have two quality setters in senior Liz Bower and sophomore Meghan Mahaffy. They have won the MAAC and been to the NCAA's the past two years. Hopefully, we can bounce back and be ready to play."

Provost Office turns to technology

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

In a continuing effort to enhance education at the University of Massachusetts, Cora Marrett, Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs, last week announced a reorganization of the Provost's Office. Changes include the responsibilities and titles of existing staff, but do not involve any personnel modifications.

Deputy Provost Norman Aitken will now hold the job title of Vice Provost for Instructional Technology. This new title will allow Aitken to focus on developing instructional technology within Academic Affairs that will support the campus's mission for success, he said.

"My basic belief is that instructional technology can't be looked at in isolation. It has to meet both student and faculty needs and I am pleased to be on the front line to do it," Aitken said.

Aitken said throughout the semester his goal will be to contact all areas of campus and bring them together as a team. He will also spend time dealing with grant proposals in order to generate more funds for the campus. He will be working closely with faculty and instructional technology support units for both on and off-campus instruction.

In the past, Aitken has developed a new collaborative model of distance learning for the Massachusetts Public Higher Education System. The model has been recognized both nationally and internationally.

In order to expand learning, Marrett said, the constantly improving instructional technologies must be integrated into the UMass community. The new changes within the Provost's Office will help administrators focus on teaching faculty and students through Web-based and multi-media courses.

"I implemented these current changes first and foremost to assure we were going to be on the cutting edge. We want to bring to the undergraduate education newer technology and enhanced learning," Marrett said.

Others who have been affected by the reorganization include Professor John Cunningham, who has taken over the position of Deputy Provost and Chief of Staff. His added responsibilities will include day-to-day activities in the office, as well as taking care of complex situations. Cunningham will also supervise programs such as the Residential Academic Programs (RAP), the Talent Advancement Programs (TAP), the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Services Center (UAASC), the Writing Program and General Education, formerly a responsibility of Aitken.

The Provost's Office oversees all academic programs on campus to keep up with what is taking place and to serve as a catalyst for what still needs to be done, Marrett said. In addition to the added focus on technology, she said, the office is always looking for new ways to improve the University. Marrett said one example of this is the Commonwealth College.

"I'm very pleased with the Commonwealth College. I'm looking for a way to try things out and then bring them to everyone; to move the ideas to the entire campus," Marrett said.

The Provost's Office joins many campuses nation-wide as it continues its plans to make instructional technology the main focus of the upcoming semester. It is an issue that will continue to grow as technology is upgraded and the University of Massachusetts makes an effort to better support and improve faculty teaching and student learning.

Presidential hopeful Bill Bradley speaks at MIT

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE – Senator Bill Bradley was welcomed with steady applause as he entered the Tang Center auditorium on the grounds of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology yesterday. Bradley, a presidential hopeful in 2000, met with an estimated 300 college students and faculty from Massachusetts schools to discuss politics in an open forum.

The forum was preceded by a more intimate session between Bradley and 15 to 20 college newspaper editors.

The crowd consisted of a handful of students from schools including Tufts University, Harvard University, Boston College and, of course, MIT, among others.

"I'm looking to get a feel for his political platform so I can figure out which way to vote," said Dan Springer, a first-year student from Harvard. "This is the second year I've been able to vote in a major election, so I'm trying to be politically responsible."

Bradley began the forum with an opening speech that mixed his political stances with humorous anecdotes about his days as a professional basketball player and as a senator. The presidential hopeful tried to express his thoughts on the position he is aspiring for and the role of the individuals present in the auditorium at the time.

"We are in the midst of multiple changes all occurring simultaneously that you guys are on the cutting edge of," Bradley said.

The Senator cited five major changes taking place. He named globalization, new military threats – like terrorism and biological weapons – new sources for immigration, and a continuing separation between parents and their children.

To Bradley, "the central job of somebody who runs for president" is to show the American people where they fit into this period of changes and how each person can get a "piece of that prosperity."

He also tried to distinguish himself from other politicians.

"I'm not taking polls to determine what I say," Bradley said, subsequently claiming he would "respect people" and vote how he saw fit.

Students and faculty then formed two lines that descended down the staircases to either side of the auditorium and took turns at respective microphones and voiced their questions and concerns. The attendees asked about a number of topics, including campaign finance reform, race and education, and Bradley gave definitive replies.

Bradley spoke strongly in favor of campaign finance reform, noting how has been refusing any political action committee (PAC) contributions and how he would accept no more than $1,000 per individual supporter in his current campaign. Continuing onto other issues, the presidential hopeful said, "The issue that is closest to my heart is racial unity." Bradley said he looked forward to a day when people could see past the color of one's skin or the shape of one's eyes in determining the worth of a person. To attain this goal, he offered his thoughts on the possibility of programs that would, in theory, teach Americans about the current racial inequality.

On the subject of education, Bradley told the crowd that the nation would be losing 2.2 million teachers over the next decade. The Senator challenged one student, a former teacher and current full-time student at the Kennedy School of Education, to go back into the classroom after she graduated, saying that the "quality of the teacher in the classroom" is the single most important factor in the education of the nation.

FBI names Bulger to most wanted list

By Elizabeth Mehren
Los Angeles Times

BOSTON – Where's Whitey?

This city's home-grown parlor game – the Boston equivalent of Elvis sightings – took on new impetus last month when crime lord and one-time FBI informant James "Whitey" Bulger was named to the FBI's 10 most-wanted list. The hunt for the 70-year-old career criminal – a near-mythic figure who disappeared in 1995 after being indicted on racketeering charges – gained more momentum when Bulger was implicated this month in some of the deaths of up to 20 people rubbed out by a Mafia hit man.

Conceding that it was "highly unusual" for a former informant to join the 10 most wanted, U.S. Attorney Donald Stern called the plea agreement his office struck with hit man John Martorano an important step toward bringing Bulger to justice.

"It can only help," Stern said in an interview. "Every local police department and state police agency throughout the country will now have Whitey Bulger's name and picture on the wall."

On Sept. 15, bolstering the government's position, U.S. District Judge Mark L. Wolf refused to uphold a claim by Bulger's sidekick Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi that the Hundreds trapped as quake hits Taiwan

7.6 magnitude tremors hardest felt in the past 64 years

By Henry Chu
Los Angeles Times

BEIJING – A massive earthquake rocked the island of Taiwan early yesterday, killing at least 657 people, injuring nearly 3,000 and trapping hundreds more in buildings that collapsed or toppled over like sand castles.

Initial reports estimated that the quake had a magnitude as great as 7.6, which would make it the most devastating tremor to hit Taiwan in 64 years and possibly the strongest in the island's recorded history. The quake's severity was on a par with the one that struck Turkey on Aug. 17, killing 16,000.

Television footage from Taiwan showed rescue workers clawing at rubble to get to people buried within. Dazed residents, some clad in only their underwear or pajamas, wandered about the darkened streets, their bodies covered with cuts, bruises and trickles of blood.

Firefighters rushed to put out blazes that cropped up across Taiwan, including in the capital, Taipei. Electricity was knocked out throughout most of the island, home to 22 million people.

The quake struck the sleeping island at 1:47 a.m. and was centered in the mountainous county of Nantou, about 90 miles southsouthwest of Taipei.

About 150 of those killed appeared to be in Nantou itself, a remote area in central Taiwan cut off from communication with the rest of the island after the tremor.

Nearly 200 people were reported dead in the nearby city of Taichung, where apartment blocks several stories collapsed on themselves. Ruptured pipes sent water flooding into streets.

Damage radiated out from the epicenter. In densely packed Taipei, rescue workers dug frantically through the debris of a hotel that had pancaked onto its lower floors.

"Hurry, go rescue people. They're in there – they're inside," one woman urged disaster crews. "I lived on the ninth floor, but now it's the fourth floor."

The emergency services will try their best to soften the situation as soon as possible, Lee said.

But continued aftershocks, some as strong as 6.8, kept the Taiwanese on edge with many too afraid to go back into their homes.

Throughout the morning, images beamed from the island showed damaged buildings, their inhabitants exhibiting a mixture of fear, shock and grim determination as they tried to locate loved ones trapped inside.

Some survivors cried out for help in finding missing relatives, others despairing buried their heads in their hands.

When it finally came, dawn shed light on both the extent of the damage and the frantic work of rescue crews who were seen on television pulling people to safety out of the rubble of some destroyed buildings hours after the quake.

But information remained sketchy throughout the morning. An explosion was reported to have ripped through a wine distillery in the town of Puli, not far from the quake's epicenter. But no figures on possible deaths or injuries were available.

Taiwan's stock and currency markets usually a hive of activity, were ordered closed yesterday.

The quake came on top of an already tense summer on the tiny island. Since July, Taipei has been locked in a rancorous war of words with Beijing after Lee described relations between the two rivals as "state to state," junking the "one China" formula that governed their ties for years.

In Beijing, which considers Taiwan a rebel province and calls its inhabitants "compatriots," President Jiang Zemin expressed concern yesterday for the quake victims and offered assistance to the island.

Starhawk will be speaking tomorrow in the Student Union Ballroom.

Pagan leader to speak at UM

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

This Thursday, SPIRALS (Students Pagans Integrating Religion and Life) will sponsor a talk and a ritual with Starhawk, a renowned author, activist and witch.

Starhawk, one of the foremost authors in the Wiccan-Pagan community, will speak in the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom. She will lead a discussion at 7 p.m. and will then follow with an open ritual.

Participation will be encouraged, regardless of familiarity with the Goddess tradition or Neo-Paganism. General admission will be between $8 and $15, depending on what a person can contribute. UMass students and staff will be admitted free and all other students will be asked to pay anywhere from $5-$15.

Starhawk is the author of The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of The Ancient Religion Of Great Goddess, Dreaming The Dark: Magic, Sex and Politics and Truth or Dare: Encounters with Power Authority and Mystery, which won the Media Alliance Meritorious Achievement Award for Nonfiction in 1988. Her first novel, The Fifth Sacred Thing, was published in 1993 and won the Lambda award for best Gay and Lesbian Science Fiction. Walking to Mercury was published in 1997. Her works have been translated into German, Danish, Italian, Portuguese and Japanese.

Starhawk is described as both a feminist and a peace activist, and is considered one the foremost voices of eco-feminism. She has traveled widely in North American and Europe lecturing and leading workshops using her research in the Goddess movement as a background.

Educated at Antioch West University and later as a lecturer at the Institute for Culture and Creation Spirituality at Holy Names College, she has consulted on the films Goddess Remembered and The Burning Times.

She currently lives part-time in San Francisco working with the Reclaiming Community, which offers classes, workshops and public rituals in the Goddess tradition.

Her speech will be part of a day of events led by SPIRALS. The group will present a Harvest Moon Festival in the Student Union Ballroom, as well as performances by Pagan and Pagan-friendly musicians. Gaia Roots will perform, and there will be circle dances by Shaker of Touchstone Farms, and the Sisters of Salome.

A dozen Pagan-oriented vendors will sell original art, craftsmanship, hard-to-find books and exotic fashions. Refreshments will be available from Earthfoods and People's Market, two co-op businesses managed by UMass students.

Contributions to fund the event have come from the UMass Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund, the Pride Alliance, Magic Circle/End of Desire and the Pioneer Valley Pagan Community.

FBI promised the pair immunity in exchange for information. He did, however, bar authorities from using some key evidence gathered via eavesdropping.

The case of Bulger and his confederates offers a fascinating window into the exploits of what was once the nation's most organized network of Irish mobsters, who fought for turf with rivals in the New England Mafia.

For decades, Whitey Bulger ruled as South Boston's version of a supreme godfather. You needed shoes for your kid? Whitey took care of it. Trouble with the Boston Housing Authority, manager of the neighborhood's numerous housing projects? Whitey took care of it. Some guy roughed up your daughter? Whitey took care of him, you better believe it.

"You had a husband giving a wife a hard time, that's the stuff you went to him for," said Peggy Davis-Mullen, a South Boston native who represents her community on Boston's City Council. "Even growing up, there was this dichotomy. You knew that he was a guy that was involved in organized crime, but you also had – I've got to be honest with you – regard for the man. I don't know what he did when he was doing his business, whatever his business was, but I know that he was a guy on the street and that he was good to people that were poor."

But while handing out favors to the needy, Whitey also was busy running crime in the area that residents call Southie and in other parts of the region. "A reign of terror," said journalist and former Boston mayoral candidate Christopher Lydon. "Twenty-plus years of thug-ocracy."

In many ways, Southie, with its 30,000 residents, is separate from the city that surrounds it, cut off by water as well as fierce neighborhood politics. When the schools of the largely Irish American community were forcibly integrated by busing in the 1970s, South Boston became infamous as the northernmost outpost of racial hatred and tension.

Bulger controlled the community's drug trade and ran a well-known band of crooks called the Winter Hill Gang, which had an impressive trade in bookmaking, extortion, racketeering and money-laundering. "He was in charge," said Michael Patrick MacDonald, author of All Souls, a new memoir about growing up in South Boston. "Nothing illegal happened without his stamp of approval."

But since at least the mid-1970s, federal officials say, Whitey Bulger was a confidential informant for the FBI. No one in South Boston would have dreamed then that Bulger was snitching, but information that has tumbled out since his disappearance shows he maintained a cushy relationship with FBI agents over 20 years.

Without agreeing to testify, Bulger provided information that led to the apprehension and conviction of numerous important criminals. Such information, some agents say, helped crack the hold of powerful mobsters, including the Patriarca crime family, for whom John Martorano was a capo and hit man.

Lengthy negotiations led to the plea agreement with Martorano unsealed here last week. He bartered a guilty plea to 10 murders in Massachusetts – as well as one in Oklahoma and another in Florida – for a prison sentence of 12 to 15 years.

Although Martorano's plea documents refer to 20 murders "aided and abetted" by "John Doe No. 1" and/or "John Doe No. 2," Stern said it would "not be unreasonable" to substitute the names of Whitey Bulger and Stephen Flemmi for the two Does. Eighteen of the murders Martorano describes were committed in Massachusetts, the last in 1976. Most of the victims were rival mob members.

Flemmi, 64, is incarcerated on a variety of charges. His lawyer, Kenneth Fishman, blasted the deal with Martorano as a desperate move.

"The government is clearly trying to deflect attention from its own conduct over a period of 30 years during which it utilized Mr. Flemmi and later Mr. Bulger in its so-called 'war on organized crime' and then shamelessly abandoned them by reneging on its promises," Fishman said.

N.C. swamped by flooding; Clinton visits

By J.R. Moehringer
Los Angeles Times

ATLANTA – President Clinton on Monday surveyed vast swaths of North Carolina still submerged beneath flood waters, nearly a week after the state took the brunt of Hurricane Floyd, while emergency crews struggled to cope with rising rivers and death tolls. One official called the mounting disaster "a 500-year flood."

"No matter how much television there is," Clinton said, "it doesn't do [the flood] justice. You can't show what it feels like inside for people."

As yet another tropical storm threatened to dump more rain on what already looks like a prehistoric lake, Clinton announced an array of federal emergency measures for flood victims, including food stamps and low-interest loans.

He urged residents of this proud, rural part of North Carolina – where farmers raise everything from tobacco to shrimp – to "take advantage of these things," promising: "The American people know that no individual can handle this alone."

But many North Carolinians

Final remarks made in Microsoft case

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – After a lengthy summer break, attorneys for the government and Microsoft Corp. returned to a federal courtroom here yesterday morning to deliver closing arguments in the software giant's antitrust trial.

In a two-hour presentation, the government's two lead attorneys told U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson that Microsoft has injured consumers by illegally using its market clout to squelch competition in the computer industry. Microsoft's attorneys, who concede the company has behaved aggressively but maintain that it has broken no laws, were scheduled to begin their arguments in the afternoon.

Stephen Houck of the New York attorney general's office argued that Microsoft's actions have "cost consumers untold millions, probably hundreds of millions of dollars." The evidence, he said, "leaves no doubt that Microsoft's illegal behavior has been bad – very bad – for consumers."

The Justice Department and 19 states allege that Microsoft has bullied and threatened competitors in an effort to maintain a monopoly with its Windows operating system software for personal computers. The government also contends that Microsoft has tried to monopolize the market for Internet browsing software and has engaged in business deals that illegally restrain trade.

"Microsoft has maintained an unshakeable stranglehold on the market for personal computer operating systems software," Houck said.

Microsoft's attorneys plan to argue Tuesday afternoon that the company does not have a monopoly because any one of many new technologies, from the rival Linux operating system to Internet-based software applications, could quickly threaten the dominance of Windows.

Houck, however, took aim at that contention, telling the judge that "what might happen in the future cannot, of course, excuse Microsoft's past conduct."

The Justice Department's attorney, David Boies, followed Houck's presentation with a summary of key evidence presented by the government in the six-month-long trial, displaying two giant projection screens worth of dozens of internal Microsoft e-mail messages and clips of a videotaped deposition of the company's chairman, Bill Gates.

"We think the record at the trial is clear," Boies said. "There are no other lawful situations where a company has done what Microsoft has done."

Houck also suggested publicly for the first time that the states would support a break-up or some other fundamental restructuring of Microsoft should the government win. "If the market remains structured as it currently is now, Microsoft will have both the means and the incentive to do what it has done for many years – to restrict consumers, to raise prices and to stifle innovation."

The closing arguments were scheduled to wrap up yesterday afternoon. Jackson is expected to issue a ruling in the next several weeks that will outline the facts he believes both sides have proven during the trial. Then, after receiving additional legal briefs from both sides, Jackson will issue a final ruling that will detail whether anti-trust laws were violated. That ruling could be issued later this year or early next year.

Killer faces death penalty

By Paul Duggan
Washington Post

BRYAN, Texas – Lawrence Russell Brewer, the former leader of a white supremacist prison group, Monday became the second defendant to be convicted in the slaying of James Byrd Jr., a black man chained behind a pickup truck and dragged to his death along a backwoods road in Jasper, Texas.

"I can't begin to describe how good we feel right now," said Mary Verrette, one of Byrd's six sisters, standing with family members outside the courthouse after the verdict. "The second weight has been lifted from our shoulders."

Brewer, 32, who could be sentenced to lethal injection, is among three men charged in one of the most gruesome racial crimes of the post-civil rights era. In the early-morning darkness of June 7, 1998, Byrd, 49, was driven into an East Texas forest, beaten, then chained at the ankles and dragged for three miles, until his head was torn off by the jagged edge of a roadside concrete culvert.

The jury that convicted Brewer of capital murder Monday afternoon immediately began hearing testimony in the penalty phase, which is expected to conclude today. The panel will then decide whether Brewer should join the instigator of the attack, John William King, 24, on Texas's death row. King, a self-described white supremacist, was found guilty in February and became the first white man in Texas since Reconstruction to be sentenced to die for the murder of a black victim.

The third defendant, Shawn Allen Berry, 24, is scheduled to go on trial Oct 24.

"Relieved – that's the word. relieved," Jasper County District Attorney Guy James Gray said after waiting four hours for Monday's verdict. "Twenty-two years I've been doing this, and it never gets easy," he added. "Everybody got nervous waiting."

Brewer's lawyers, who declined to discuss the case during the trial, did not attend a news conference after Monday's verdict.

The jury, which includes no black members, reached its verdict after five days of testimony. If the panel of five women and seven men, including a Latino man, opts against the death penalty, Brewer will be sentenced to life in prison with parole eligibility after 40 years.

"There was never a worry that an all-white jury wouldn't do the correct thing," said Gray, who had prosecuted King before a jury that included one black member. "It just doesn't matter who the victim is. A murder is a murder."

Byrd, who was unemployed and living alone in a subsidized apartment, was walking home from a family gathering after midnight when he was picked up and driven to woods outside Jasper, a racially mixed city of 8,000, about 125 miles north of Houston. After being beaten, chained and dragged along a winding ribbon of pavement, his body was dumped at the gate of a small, historically black cemetery.

Brewer and King, both of whom had arrest records for burglary, were prison cellmates in the early 1990s and belonged to a racist group, according to Gray, who said Brewer was the group's leader, with the title "exalted cyclops." Prosecutors told jurors in both trials that King instigated Byrd's murder to draw attention to a white supremacist group that he planned to form in Jasper.

Brewer, who took the witness stand on the fifth day of testimony in the case last Friday, admitted that he was present when Byrd was chained and dragged, but said he did not take part in the killing. Brewer said he thought Byrd was already dead when the dragging began because, he testified, Berry had slashed Byrd's throat.

But Gray offered an array of evidence that he said proved that all three men took part in the killing. Medical witnesses said there was no evidence of Byrd's throat having been cut, and traces of Byrd's blood were found on each man's shoes.

As they did in King's trial, prosecutors in Brewer's case presented evidence that Byrd was alive and conscious when the dragging began. The evidence was crucial because it was the underlying felony of kidnapping that made Byrd's murder a death penalty offense, and for Byrd to have been kidnapped under Texas's legal definition, he had to have been alive during the dragging.

"I don't know if he was conscious when he hit the culvert," pathologist Thomas Brown testified. "I pray that he wasn't."

Because of the worldwide publicity generated by the crime and by King's trial in Jasper, the judge in Brewer's case granted a change of venue to the defense, moving Brewer's trial 160 miles west to the small city of Bryan, near Texas A&M University.

"I don't like the death penalty, but that's what he deserves," Gray said of Brewer. "The just punishment for his case and these facts and circumstances is death."

■ flooding

couldn't hear him. For a sixth straight day, thousands remained trapped in churches, schools and other makeshift shelters, some surrounded on all sides by water, with no idea when they might be able to leave or what they might find once they do.

"It's like nothing you've ever seen," said Lisa Schell, spokeswoman for North Carolina's Department of Environment and Natural Resources. "It is a problem of monstrous proportions."

Renee Hoffman, spokeswoman for the state's emergency response team, said that no flood has ever devastated North Carolina this way. Not only is the volume of water immense, but the nature of it is different.

"This is water that's decided to come and stay awhile," she said. "It's a different kind of flood."

Three major rivers – the Cape Fear, the Tar and the Lumber – are at twice their flood levels, and just now beginning to crest. The Neuse, meanwhile, continues to rise, and won't crest any time soon if weather forecasts hold true.

At least 2 million people are affected by the flood, in an area the size of Marsland. Roughly 10,000 have been left homeless, scattered among 50 Red Cross shelters.

Food and bottled water are being trucked into the state, and supplies are being airlifted to three shelters reachable only by boat or plane. They stand out like an archipelago in a dirty ocean contaminated by everything from hog carcasses to cottonmouth snakes.

Officials can do nothing, however, about the frazzled nerves inside: fistfights have been erupting among shelter-trapped refugees suffering acute "cabin-fever."

Besides 32 people known dead in North Carolina – most swept away when they tried to ford streams in their cars – 1 million chickens and turkeys have been drowned, as have more than 110,000 hogs and countless house pets. When the water finally recedes, perhaps this weekend, officials expect they will find many more people now listed as missing.

Play it safe

Early in the morning on Sunday Sept. 12, a Boston University freshman was sexually assaulted in the bathroom of her dormitory while she was washing her face. A man hid behind a shower curtain and raped her at knifepoint in a shower stall after entering the building through an open window in the basement (Boston Globe, B1, 9/14/99).

Welcome to college.

I am entering my fourth year here, and nothing like this has occurred in either of the two residence halls I have lived in on this campus. And yet the idea lurks around the corners of my brain like some uninvited and unwanted party guest. Leaving my room unlocked is the exception, not the rule, even though I trust the people who live in my hallway. Ever since an intoxicated female hallmate accidentally entered my room one night freshman year, awakening me from sleep, I have always remembered to lock my door.

Alexis Pushkar

I never enter the bathroom without thinking about the safety – or complete lack thereof – in many bathrooms on campus. Once inside any bathroom in Orchard Hill, an intruder can easily block the two doors and trap someone. The only way out is through windows that don't open wide enough for a body to fit through. And who wants to jump out of a seventh floor window, anyway? A person can easily hide in the shower stalls or the toilet stalls. Late at night, bleary-eyed with sleep and sporting impractical footgear like flip-flops, I really don't present much in the way of a formidable opponent. I might as well wear a sign that says, "Please attack me." I'd like to think that I could do some good Aeon Flux fight moves, but faced with a knife, I probably would not.

> "Who can forget Janet Leigh's scene in Psycho when Norman Bates comes at her with a knife while she takes a shower?"

In my opinion, the bathroom is the place where women are the most vulnerable to attackers. Sitting on toilets with their pants down, naked in showers, washing their faces while bent over sinks with soap just a dribble away from their eyes, women are in susceptible positions.

Movies and other media that depict the defenselessness of women in the bathroom have compounded my fears. Who can forget Janet Leigh's scene in Psycho when Norman Bates comes at her with a knife while she takes a shower? Or less commonly remembered but just as powerful: the climactic scene in Fatal Attraction where Michael Douglas's wife is taking a bath and Glenn Close attacks her. The Fatal Attraction scene reminds the audience of how dangerous the bathroom is. Hot water, a slippery floor, porcelain surfaces and glass mirrors all contrive to create an accident waiting to happen. I can't help but be wary whenever I enter a bathroom.

Many men I have talked to do not necessarily share the same wariness that is part of the way I think every single day. They think of the residence halls as safe, and they don't have shadowy attackers lurking in the corners of their brains. I don't feel like I have that luxury, and all the security people, card swipes, alarms and locks in the world cannot take away the feeling that someday I might be a sexual assault statistic.

In all fairness to the statistics, what happened at B.U. is atypical. Thousands of young women and men are not attacked in college bathrooms each year. In addition, strangers are responsible for only about one in five of the 500,000 rapes reported annually by women, according to the Bureau of Justice. Instead, women are six times as likely as men to have the violence perpetrated against them be by an intimate (a husband or a boyfriend).

In the context of a college campus, date rape or acquaintance rape may be a more likely occurrence than a random sexual assault by a stranger in the bathroom. However, the B.U. incident does bring up the issue of residence hall safety that applies to everyone who lives on campus. Be careful whom you sign in and make sure you know them well, because you are responsible for them. Don't prop the doors open; we have a card access system to prevent people from just walking in.

Sometimes I feel rude watching people struggle with umbrellas and backpacks and wallets and groceries and ID credit cards as they try to find their ID card and swipe it. More than likely, the person lives in my building, but sometimes I feel uncomfortable opening the door for people or holding the door open on that slim chance that they are coming into the building to cause trouble.

In addition to sexual assault, people who do not live in the building may cause other forms of trouble. Simple theft and vandalism are things that also threaten us, should doors be left open for anyone to enter. Additionally, peace of mind is a big factor for some people, especially those who are adjusting to the new college environment and are not used to living with so many strangers in such close quarters.

I don't mean to cause unwarranted paranoia about living on campus, especially for those of you who are new here. As I said before, I have lived here for three years already and have yet to have a problem. However, I do think that public awareness of this issue should be raised because everyone's safety is too important to be put in jeopardy by the actions of the careless who leave doors open, allowing troublemakers to enter the buildings.

An eye on the storm

I miss Florida. I miss the wild weather I used to experience when I lived there. The last crazy storm I experienced happened during my Christmas vacation in North Palm Beach, Florida. It was a rare storm. The news reports called it "Boxing Day." This uncommon storm was actually a series of massive thunderstorms coming in off the Atlantic. The storms were lined up in a row and hit the exact same spot, all 12 of them.

My girlfriend and I just happened to be staying with friends whose apartment complex was in the storm's direct path. After 10 straight hours of Biblical rains, my friend woke me up at 6:00 a.m. to tell me the entire place was under water. The flood was up to the rear-view mirrors on most of the vehicles in the lot.

My girlfriend's car had six inches of water covering the floor when I decided to try to get it to higher ground. When I opened the car door, I needed to close the door quickly to prevent the water from rushing in after me. I put the key in the ignition and although the exhaust pipe was under water, I turned over the engine. It started. I could hear the bubbles blowing out the tail pipe as I put the car in gear and slowly drove through the water, while trying not to go too fast and risk making the front submarine and flooding the carburetor. I made it out of the complex and turned onto Route A1A, which was flooded about two feet deep, and finally found a spot where the water was low. It was only one foot deep, so I parked the car and began to wade (and in some places swim) back to the apartment in the dark, through lightening and pelting rain.

When the storms finally stopped, the real Floridians began the task of removing water from their cars and houses. Many waded or canoed to the nearest flooded store and bought beer and ribs for the BBQ.

The tourists and seasonal folks didn't handle the flood in the same manner. We could hear them crying and screaming obscenities all morning. One man with a New York accent was screaming about how he was going to sue someone for all they were worth. Sue whom? God?

Our drive back to Amherst was unbearable due to the horrible, wet stench of mold and mildew. The next morning after our arrival, the Massachusetts winter froze the water that had crept its way into the transmission. The sopping wet transmission froze completely solid. It would start, but it wouldn't move – a New England conclusion to just another average vacation in Florida.

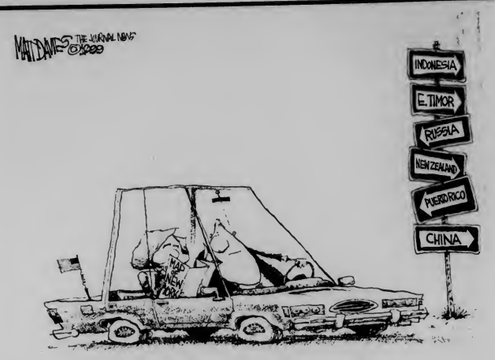
With the news coverage of hurricane Floyd's assault on the Atlantic coast, I can only think of how badly I wish I were there. For someone like myself who has lived in "hurricane alley," I view the constant CNN coverage of the storm much differently than your typical Northerner views it. When I see the images of rain, wind and waves, I don't think of stocking up on water and canned goods. I think of how many days of school will be canceled due to wind damage and flooding. I think of getting to the surf-shop before closing to buy a new cake of Mr. Zogg's Sex Wax to rub down my board. When the storm ends, the surf can be 10 feet over head; these are not waves to be missed.

Scott Baehr

But this is the difference between how a real Floridian and a newly transplanted Northerner thinks about hurricanes. They are dangerous, scary and exciting. Maybe your town will be hit, maybe not. It is just a part of life in the South.

CNN bombards us with images of panic-stricken people who have been sitting and stinking in a high school gym that has been transformed into a temporary shelter. The people on the news seem more interested in ensuring their Northern friends will view them on TV, as they give their horrifying account of the 20-knot winds from a hurricane that will touch shore two states away. It's all very dramatic.

I never knew any of these people, or at least I tried to ignore them. The real Floridians seem to enjoy hurricanes. In August and September they methodically check their storm supplies, which include canned goods, batteries (so they can listen to their Jimmy Buffet tapes when the power goes out), kerosene lanterns and most importantly... beer and booze. Unlike the people portrayed in the news, they are already prepared, although the beer and booze supply has probably been consumed. They lock down the storm shudders over the windows, but spend more time double and triple lashing their boats to the moorings. Boats are always more important than their houses, no matter how crappy the boat.



But CNN never shows these people calmly preparing for the storm while sipping beers and humming "Margaritaville." These people aren't newsworths. There is no panic in their eyes. In fact these folks are probably hoping the storm builds force and wipes out all the condos from Fort Lauderdale to Ocean City, MD.

Now don't get me wrong. I doubt that any of these people want to see anyone hurt, but the idea of a couple million sunburned, Yankee "snowbirds" scampering back north with their tails between their legs is a secret dream of many Florida natives. The Northerners have already cluttered the New England coast with time-sharing shanties with cheesy names like "Laughing Gull" or – here is an original one – "Sea Breeze." A couple of monster hurricanes might just keep these people away from the tropical South. These folks should stay in New England and New Jersey where they can swim in their polluted waters, walk up and down trash-covered beaches, and look at the beautiful, treeless coastline of nothing but ice cream shacks, fried clam joints, arcades and goofy golf.

I miss Florida. During the floods, I miss seeing Floridians fishing for bass off the roofs of their cars in what was formerly a parking lot, while tourists are crying because their Mercedes was ruined.

Go, hurricanes, go. Maybe they will purge our coast. Maybe they will come north and wipe out Salisbury Beach and Old Orchard. Heaven knows those places need a good bath.

U can make it

Last Friday afternoon I got a telephone call. It came at the worst possible time. My friend Tim and I were butchering songs on the bass and guitar, respectively, with our amps turned up when the phone rang. After being here for two years I knew the typical response time for an UMass staff member, and I had convinced myself that I wouldn't hear back from the University until Monday. (I am still waiting for my cable to be fixed and for my Micro Fridge to come, but part of the blame for that is my Jersey roommate's.)

Matt Frascella

"Hi Matt. I got your message about reviewing your resume," my career counselor said.

We talked for a while, and my eyes lit up as I discussed my hopes and dreams for my career, my future, and my life after UMass. I envisioned a spacious office with a nice view of the city and a job in a challenging and stimulating field.

"I see," he said. "Well, none of those firms that you described even consider UMass students for positions," he replied nonchalantly.

To say I was crushed would be an understatement. I have seen bugs on my windshield with more life left in them. This career is the reason I am here. This is the goal that I have been working for, the end that I have been working so hard to reach. I almost started crying. Few things make me cry; Michael Jordan draining the final shot of his illustrious career to win the championship, a quality dramatic movie like The Cutting Edge, or the time that Dawson and Joey broke up.... Eh, anyway, I was borderline teary-eyed.

I was also a little upset with his attitude. How can this University embrace an attitude of mediocrity? I hate mediocrity. Mediocrity is exemplified by all the TV shows on the CBS network. Does anyone actually watch "Everybody Loves Raymond?" Aren't I paying tuition to learn marketable skills for the work force? The longer I listened to my career advisor, the angrier I became.

"In the past students who have worked there have had a family member or friend help them get a job at a place like that. I can encourage you to seek out a position on your own."

So that's what they mean by "U-Make it happen." I was glad to see that the nepotism of the old boys' network is still in prime form.

"Those firms tend to look at an Amherst College student. I have tried to get them to come here, but I am always turned down. My advice is to get the best GPA you can and try another more reachable firm."

That was the last straw. I was full-fledged pissed-off now. Anyone who knows me can tell you how I take being second-best. I hate it. I hate it more than I hate the Backstreet Boys, or the drunken bed spins, or pompous schools like Amherst College.

The ironic part of this little horror story is that I could have gone to school up the road at Amherst College or at a number of other "good" schools, but I chose not to. Why you might ask? For one simple reason: I felt that UMass would teach me things those other schools could not. I didn't feel like I could fit into the polo playing, spoiled kid "I'm better than you" atmosphere. I still believe that, now more than ever.

Whether he meant to or not, that career counselor ignited a fire within me. Nothing motivates me or focuses me more than being told that I can't do something. If you tell me I can't do something, I'll prove you wrong. I still intend to work at one of those firms, and I will work for one of those firms.

What bothers me the most about this little episode is the perception of UMass students. Why are we perceived as losers? Why is a state school not good enough for these firms? What separates an UMass student from an Amherst College student? For all they know I could have taken all my classes at Amherst through the Five-College System. Then nothing would be different about my education except the name of the school on the degree and a whole lot of extra money in my bank account. What I may not have considered before now is that that money, as superfluous as I see it to be, buys something. It buys a reputation. Apparently a reputation is worth a lot these days. Somehow education got lost in that mix. It is a sad day in the world when merit and ability is displaced by money and reputation.

> "Why are we perceived as losers? Why is a state school not good enough for these firms? What separates an UMass student from an Amherst College student?"

I thought that this elitist attitude was going by the wayside as human beings slowly evolved enough to recognize that skin color, sex, age, physical handicaps and wealth are not measures of worth or ability. Sadly, I am wrong.

My point, however, is simple. I am damn proud to go to school here. As much as I bitch about overcrowding, faculty cuts, and the Chancellor's drunken gallivanting about Europe, I do so because I think we are entitled to the best education. I love this school and it makes me mad when we are labeled as second-class "safety school" kids. We are better than that. That perception is wrong. I know it is. It just feels wrong, like the offy guy who tried to sell you that used car. Don't let anyone label you as "just a UMass grad," or even worse, do not believe that label yourself.

To all the companies who don't look at UMass grads consider this: Jack Welch, CEO of one of this nation's largest corporations, General Electric (GE owns NBC, WNBC, Radio City Music Hall and a whole block in NY City), is a UMass grad. I dare you to tell him he is not capable of running that company because he didn't go to Amherst College.

Or maybe the General Motors shareholders should fire John Smith, CEO of GM, because he went here. Or try telling George Ditomassi, CEO of Hasbro/Milton Bradley (I really love that game Risk, keep up the good work), or Robert Mahoney, CEO of Citizens Bank of Boston, or Richard Goldstein, CEO of Unilever, U.S., Inc., that being an UMass alumnus is a handicap. They would probably laugh in your face.

If these companies do not want to hire me, or you, because we are UMass students, then that is their loss. I'm not going to let someone's bad attitude stop me from fulfilling my dreams.

BLUE STREAK
Directed by Les Mayfield with Martin Lawerence and Luke Wilson
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Martin Lawerence revolutionized the question "What'z UUUP" in his hit Fox TV show "Martin." That is exactly the question I would like to ask this bad boy of comedy after seeing the new motion picture Blue Streak.

After a series of successful films including the bittersweet comedy Life with Eddie Murphy and the hysterical Nothing to Lose co-starring with Tim Robbins, Martin Lawerence had proven that a transition from stand-up comedy-to TV sitcom-to film career could be done.

Then, like those adventurous stand-up comedians before him (Dna Carvey and Norm McDonald), he takes a film that will draw people into a theater and then push them out just as quickly.

Blue Streak is another one of those summer movies with no substance and a wacky leading man that draws the audience's attention from the dwindling story line. Martin Lawerence does the best he can, super-imposing his popular style of comedy (even taking the character "Getto Buck" from his sitcom) onto an action packed, but familiar story.

Lawerence plays Miles Logan, a jewel thief who has just stolen a 15 million dollar diamond. After a series of clichéd events, Miles hides the diamond in an air-conditioning vent and memorizes the two streets that the half-constructed building is sitting on. He is put into the squad car. Two years later, Logan is released from prison and goes to where he hid the diamond. Now brace yourselves for the really original plot twist: the building he hid the diamond in is now a L.A.P.D. precinct. It doesn't get any better than that, does it?

To get access to the diamond, Logan forges documents to become a police officer. Then through muddled conversation, Logan is paired up with Carlson (Luke Wilson, Home Fries and Rushmore), a newly promoted detective who, for over five years, has been working the traffic detail. Logan is assigned to teach Carlson how to be a detective, even though Logan has no experience himself.

Wilson adds some fundamental humor, like mimicking Logan's urban movements and language. We see Wilson's character become a street-smart cop because of Logan's "unorthodox" teachings (to Logan "whooping ass" is equal to interrogation). Also on the L.A.P.D. force is William Forsythe who plays S.W.A.T. commander Deacon. Forsythe is best known for his portrayals of tough cops (the action film The Rock). Forsythe is great in this role, as he mocks the image that made him well known throughout Hollywood.

With Deacon and Carlson by his side, Logan somehow becomes head burglars detective. As Logan tries to retrieve the diamond from the air-duct (using amazing virtual reality equipment, which I guess all jewel thieves have in their basements) he gets pulled into a drug bust and helps the FBI capture the stereotypical Mexican drug lord, which leads into a series of decent chase scenes.

Despite the actors' attempts to make the film interesting, the script takes off on other action/comedies, so all the traits and language are tedious and redundant. Les Mayfield (the director behind the slapstick comedy Flubber and Encino Man) doesn't try to make up for the script and instead uses footage that is silly and animated, like the many times we see Martin Lawerence do happy dances. Mayfield can't seem to decide whether to focus on Lawrence's unique moves or Wilson's questioning looks when the two share a scene, and the humor that should exist is lost.

Blue Streak will not make you do a double take because it is so familiar. Trust me, wait until this one is on the UMass movie channel.

Mosh pits are now the pits at rock concerts, festivals

By J.D. Considine
Baltimore Sun

"Concerts get such a bad name, because of the mosh pit and everything like that," said Limp Bizkit guitarist Wes Borland, as he sat in a quiet cafe in his hometown of Jacksonville, Fla.

It was in late May, and Limp Bizkit was still weeks away from releasing its second album, Significant Other. But even as fans were anxiously awaiting the disc, many of their parents were harboring anxieties of a different sort. Borland understood. "[I] think a lot of parents really freak out and get afraid of it," he said, referring to the surging sea of teen aggression on the concert floor that constitutes a mosh pit.

A fixture at concerts by aggressive, hard-hitting bands, the mosh pit has become a subject of concern to many parents, as kids return from the pits battered and bruised.

Sprains and broken bones resulting from moshing (a violent form of dance in which the participants careen off one another like kernels in a popcorn popper) and crowd surfing (a practice in which fans are passed overhead by members of the crowd) have been a fact of life for years at concerts featuring the thrash-oriented heavy metal of Metallica, the latter-day punk of Green Day and the rock-rap fusion of Limp Bizkit.

Lately, though, a more disturbing trend has developed in the pit. Young women have reported being groped or stripped while crowd surfing and there have even been a few reports of sexual assaults having taken place in mosh pits.

Not surprisingly, parents think it's anarchy. "But as far as I can tell," says Borland, "it's really safe [at concerts]. I mean, there's alcohol there, but there's alcohol in a lot of places. I would rather send my kids to a concert, and have them there, because there's so much security... Concerts are a place to have fun, not a place to go and start riots."

That, however, was before Woodstock '99. Fans did, in fact, riot on Sunday, July 25, the final night of that festival. They trashed vehicles, looted vendor tents and set fires until finally being driven from the concert grounds by helmeted riot police. By the time the smoke had cleared, New York State police had made 40 arrests, and were investigating 90 other reported crimes, including eight sex offenses, one of which was an alleged mosh pit rape during Limp Bizkit's Saturday night set.

There was much hand-wringing in the festival's aftermath, as baby boomer commentators wondered how the "peace and love" heritage of the original Woodstock could have turned into something so dark and destructive. Many, including some of the musicians who played Woodstock '99, blamed the music, singling out aggressive, in-your-face bands such as Limp Bizkit, Korn and Metallica. The mosh pit violence at Woodstock, fumed the pundits, was just one more example of how degraded popular culture has become.

"The thing that I felt was unfair, in the follow-up in the press, was the demonization of a generation," said guitarist Tom Morello of Rage Against the Machine, the band that followed Limp Bizkit at Woodstock '99. "There was just this vilification of a whole generation and the bands that they like, based on this concert. I think it's ridiculous."

However, Morello added, "The one thing that is absolutely unforgivable or unpardonable are the reported sexual assaults."

Morello agreed that sometimes the action in the pit can get out of control. But, he argued, that sort of excess is easily enough stopped.

"If we see anything like that from the stage, Zack (De La Rocha, Rage's singer) always stops the show," said Morello.

"Because we have a great deal of respect for our audience, and we demand that they respect one another. The Rage pit is a place that should be safe for anyone of any age or gender to have a great time."

Trouble is, the amount of respect in the average mosh pit has been in decline in recent years, so much so that even the artists are beginning to complain. Rapper Kid Rock believes that the ugliness in the pit reflects a growing lack of civility among concert-goers.

He cites the practice of women pulling up their shirts to flash their breasts as an example. "When they first started doing that, years ago, it was great," said Rock. "A girl would pull her shirt off, everyone would look and cheer. 'Wow, it's wild rock 'n' roll.'"

"Now guys are grabbing the chicks. I say, 'You can't do that...' I gotta tell these guys, 'Look, if a girl pulls her shirt up, don't be grabbing at her.' Like, how stupid is that?"

Rock refers to the mosh pit in his breakthrough hit, "Bawitdaba," when he enjoins his fans to "Get in the pit and try to love someone." Originally, however, the song had him shouting, "Get in the pit and try to kill someone," a lyric he's now glad he changed. "I don't want to be The Kid [who does] the show where people are dying," he said recently.

So Rock instead put a 180-degree spin on the original line. "Get in the pit and love someone was great, because that's technically how the pit started out," he said. "It was like, you fall down, someone helps you up. It's showing some love."

"A lot of these young kids nowadays don't understand that," he added. "They're out there literally trying to beat each other up. Which is stupid."

Slam dancing, an original form of what is now moshing, developed in Southern California in 1978, as a visceral and immediate reaction to the anger and energy of the music, a way for the audience to achieve catharsis through sheer physical activity. At the same time, it contributed to the sense of group identity, demonstrating to each person in the pit that he or she was really with the music and the scene.

But as the scene developed, both the music and the dancing became more charged-up, and the real "hardcore" fans tried to distance themselves from insincere suburban posers. Huntington Beach, Calif., in Orange County became one of the first beach-heads for this new, take-no-prisoners attitude.

Later, hard-core begat thrash, a harder, faster sound that boasted both punk rock and heavy metal variants, and fans began to shift to a dance called the Huntington Beach Shuffle, a variation of slam dancing that took place in a large circle within the crowd.

Over time, as the practice spread among metal fans, the shuffle began to be referred to as "moshing," a term most likely derived from the ska expression "mash it up now." (In Jamaican patois, the word "mash" sounds like "mosh.")

By the mid-'80s, mosh pits were a standard feature at shows by bands like Anthrax and Metallica. But as the metal scene grew and moshing became more widely known, the physical release of banging into other people began to take precedence over the importance of brotherhood or even the music itself.

Brazilian guitarist Max Cavalera, of the metal bands Sepultura and Soulfly, remarked on the change as early as 1994. Certain fans, he noted, don't really care what a band is saying, preferring instead to focus on the energy the act generates. "There are shows where it doesn't matter who's playing, doesn't matter what's playing," he said. "A band doesn't even need to be onstage. It could just be music from the P.A., and they go for it."

Breaking down "Boundaries"

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Correspondent

Bridges and Boundaries Revisited: African Americans and American Jews, presented at the University Gallery from September 11 through October 22, is a glimpse into the past and present conflicts and commonalities between Jews and African Americans in the context of American history, and an examination of the reasons for the hostilities between these groups now.

Although both have their own distinct story of extreme hardship faced while coming to America, either as slaves or immigrants, a common bond can be drawn between the two groups. Diagrams on display of the slave ships that mark the start of trials faced in America by African Americans and diagrams from third class and steerage that brought many Jewish immigrants overseas are notably similar, as are the similarities between the "Middle Passage" and the Holocaust, marked by both photographs and sketches featured in the exhibit.

Later, hard-core begat thrash, a harder, faster sound that boasted both punk rock and heavy metal variants, and fans began to shift to a dance called the Huntington Beach Shuffle, a variation of slam dancing that took place in a large circle within the crowd.

The accounts of African American enslavement and the biblical story of the Egyptian captivity of the Israelites also bear a remarkable resemblance to each other, which starts the history of intersection between the two factions in American history.

Another part of the exhibit chronicles what is referred to as "scientific racism," or the use of science, such as physiognomy and phrenology, the study of the shape of the skull, to discover differences between racial groups, often used as a rationalization in the inhuman treatment and killing of Jews and African Americans. Even though this method, and any method used to firmly establish distinct physical differences was discredited, these stereotypes, separating the two groups from whites and singling them out as objects of hatred and discrimination, still occur and continue to play a part in society.

Actual trading cards, magazines and posters were enlarged for this display, which have the "typical" Jew and African American depicted on them, the former shown as money-loving, and the latter, in tattered clothing, wielding a razor over his head.

The intolerance and segregation felt by the Jewish and African American communities are also similar, as photographs of actual store and restaurant signs show that many store owners catered only to the "white trade," and pamphlets advertising hotels barred "Hebrews" from their establishments.

A particularly chilling part of the display is an authentic Ku Klux Klan uniform, and a picture background of a Klan meeting, a reminder of common threats and enemies of the two communities.

During the Civil Rights Movements of the fifties and sixties, Jews and African Americans were also joined together in a fight for equality. Leaders of both communities stepped forward in collaboration with one another, noting the shared past of intolerance and hardships.

The tension between the groups, as Civil Rights leaders fought to keep white intervention away, mounted at this time. This tension continued into the seventies and eighties, as Jews, on the whole, had consistent economic success, and moved into the suburbs, populated by whites, while African Americans still faced much racism and very little economic progress, and remained in urban areas.

This gap was further widened by leaders of both communities distancing themselves from the common struggle that forged the alliance of the two groups, such as when Louis Farrakhan, the leader of the Nation of Islam, spoke out against Judaism. But, even as the gap grew, neo-Nazism was on the rise, and a common enemy was a reminder, despite successes in their struggles, that Jews and African Americans still faced common barriers in America.

The exhibit chronicles this legacy with pictures, paintings, sculpture and sketches.

Bridges and Boundaries Revisited explores ways in which two different groups can exist in harmony, prosper in a nation populated with many cultures, and gain strength from common bonds.

Despite the unique characters of the two communities, and the different hardships that were faced by both, documented and examined by the artwork and photographs in the exhibit, the message is one of hope and inspiration.

This exhibit celebrates the unique culture and religion of both groups, but also celebrates their common strengths in fighting injustice in America.

At the same time, it reminds all visitors to this display that this fight is not over, and will be only when cross cultures can learn tolerance and acceptance through shared experiences, as the Jewish and African American community have demonstrated in the past.

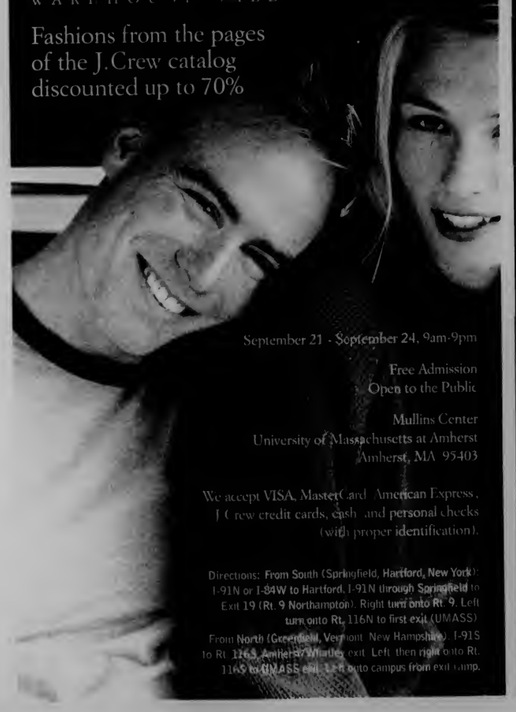
"Murmurs" debuts

Scenic art is an expression of the natural beauty which surrounds our daily lives. In today's society we sometimes forget to stop to enjoy and experience our surroundings because of busy schedules.

Murmurs of Awe, Vol. 2 is an art exhibition which captures the inspirational beauty here at UMass. Creator and UMass graduate student, Tony Jno Baptiste, desires to share with the viewer the "simplicity and naturalness that we all can experience through art, if only for a brief moment. Stop... breathe... and come alive with murmurs of awe."

The exhibit focuses on natural scenic art consisting of sculptures of wooden implements, leaves, grasses, shells and other natural elements, which are hung, posed and naturally preserved.

Murmurs of Awe, Vol. 2 opens today in the Student Union Art Gallery. The official opening is scheduled for tomorrow from 5-7 p.m. The exhibit will run through Oct. 1 in the Student Union Art Gallery.



Tony Jno Baptiste's natural scenic art is on display today through Oct. 1 in the Student Union Gallery

King's heart lies in newly risen Atlantis

By Malcolm L. Johnson
Hartford Courant

HEARTS IN ATLANTIS
Stephen King

Many of the earlier novels by America's most popular and prolific storyteller refer to the '60s. But in his new book, touched by musings on alternative worlds and ignited by a mad hallucination, Stephen King offers up what feels like an intensely personal reflection on a time of great idealism and conflict and pain, the era of his childhood and young manhood.

Hearts in Atlantis sounds quite sentimental, and some parts of the book brim with an intense romanticism, but King is having a little chuckle over his title. The Atlantis reference, which recurs and deepens over the course of a tale spanning four decades, first crops up at the start of the central section of the book, which echoes the title. And while love figures strongly in this depiction of a freshman year at the University of Maine at Oromo, King's alma mater, a marathon card game takes up much too much of the first-person narrative. In the second chapter, set in 1966, King, through his alter ego, delivers his sharpest reflection on his rite of passage: "When I try to talk about the sixties, when I even try to think about them, I am overcome by horror and hilarity. I see bellbottom pants and Earth Shoes. I smell pot and patchouli, incense and peppermints. And I hear Donovan Leitch singing his sweet and stupid song about the continent of Atlantis, lyrics that still seem profound to me in the watches of the night, when I can't sleep..." He ends by hailing Atlantis, which then evolves into a symbol of lost innocence, of a young America that betrayed itself.

Throughout the sometimes affecting, sometimes irritating look back at the start of protests against the war in Vietnam, Peter Riley and his dorm mates play Hearts, hence the title. King recounts some of the card games in detail, which is where the tedium enters in. But for King, the game becomes a kind of trap, a compulsion that lures its players to destruction. Failing their courses by ignoring their studies as they play far into the night, they leave school and thus become eligible for the dreaded and deadly draft.

The brief and increasingly surreal fourth chapter, which intercuts a day in 1999 with glimpses of the horrors of an aborted My Lai massacre, is told from the point of view of Sully-John, a trooper nearly killed in an explosion during a fierce firefight, who is attending the funeral of a war buddy. This section and the elegiac epilogue, another funeral, take place in southwestern Connecticut, where the book begins and where King spent his childhood. The paranoiac stroll through southern Connecticut in 1960 also gives Bobby his first taste of passion for the opposite sex, Carol Gerber, whose injury by a trio of Catholic schoolboy thugs is avenged by the knightly Bobby, becomes the thread that knots together Hearts in Atlantis. By the second chapter, in which she gives herself to Pete Riley in King's most frank and erotic passage, she is on her way to becoming King's anti-war, radical Joan of Arc, and the most admirable and transcendent character in what will surely be seen as his best novel yet.

Like almost everything King has written solo and under his own name, Hearts in Atlantis proves to be a book that the reader is reluctant to put down for long. It also displays a kind of unshowy virtuosity as King works in various voices, techniques and genres, finally pulling them all together in a poetic coda. What must be understood about King, however, is that he is not really improving with age.

Though his prose is often uneven, King has always been capable of fine writing, all the way back to The Shining. Hearts in Atlantis will doubtless be admired for its autobiographical touches, for its strong senses of place and for its enriching uses of literature and especially pop music. These have always been the hallmarks of so many novels by a man who clearly lives to write and continually strives to reinvent himself.

trade" of '97 (Lowe and Jason Varitek from Seattle for Heathcliff Slocumb). The Dearborn, Michigan product may not have brought the best stats with him from the Mariners (2-4, 6.96 ERA in 53 innings pitched), but this was once again an example of an undeniable talent that lacked maturation in a winning atmosphere.

Under the tutelage of Kerrigan, Lowe has developed into one of the most versatile bullpen pitchers in the big leagues. Whether it's coming in to nail down the final two outs of an extra-innings squeaker or chucking three-plus innings of shutout lead protection, Lowe's six wins and 14 saves have played a critical part in the team's success thus far in '99.

The Prodigal Sons of Williams are not confined to the pitching staff, luckily. The shrewd dealings of GM (and Amherst College grad) Dan Duquette, combined with the always-solid Boston farm system, have produced a plethora of position players that spell a bright future for the Sox.

Enough has been said about Nomar Garciaparra. By now, everyone (including Derek Jeter) should agree that the 26 year-old Georgia Tech grad and former Olympian represents the future for not only the Bosox, but baseball as a whole. When Ted Williams named Nomar as the next guy to likely reach the hallowed .400 plateau, it confirmed Garciaparra's spot at the forefront of the national pastime's next generation.

One of Nomar's Yellowjacket teammates who has endured a less-storied rise to Fenway notoriety is Jason Varitek, arguably the best catching prospect the Sox have had since Rich Gedman. After entering '99 as a candidate for platoon-duty at backstop for Boston, the 27 year-old Minnesotan took advantage of an injury to teammate Scott Hatteberg by cementing himself into the everyday catcher's spot. Only Texas All-Star Ivan Rodriguez has caught more games in the AL in '99 than Varitek, whom Street and Smith's magazine called "the best college catcher ever."

More accolades have come from Peter Gammons, who last week declared Varitek the second-best catcher in the game behind Rodriguez. And the Boston backstop has garnered lots of attention from his skipper, too: Williams recently raised Varitek to the third spot in the Red Sox batting order, where his .272 average and 18 homers will help protect cleanup hitter Garciaparra. Though the rigors of everyday catching can often curtail a promising career, the gritty Varitek is widely regarded among his teammates as their catcher of the future.

The Sox infield, an ever-changing ensemble of talent and desire, has featured two of the franchise's marquee youngsters this season. The first is Donnie Sadler, an absolute speed-demon who can play second, short, third, and even a little centerfield. Sadler's breathtaking range and quick bat have had scouts drooling all year, watching him leg out infield singles with ease and stretch base hits into extra bases.

And the 24 year-old fits wonderfully into Williams' NL-style of play, which makes frequent use of bunts, hit-and-runs, and mid-game substitutions aimed at improving team speed and defense.

Though injuries are never good for a club, the loss of third baseman John Valentin has given Boston a chance to try out prospect Wilton Veras at the hot corner, and the results have been nothing short of spectacular. The 23 year-old Monte Cristian has quickly become a fan favorite with his opportunistic bat (.306 BA, .429 SLG, 12 RBI in 29 games) and vacuum-cleaner defense at third.

Rounding out the Red Sox list of young diamond dandies is right fielder Trot Nixon. After struggling through the months of April and May to get his average above .200, the 25 year-old native of Durham, North Carolina gave serious merit to Williams' decision to keep him around, going on a mid-season tear that raised his average to .280. After hitting his fifteenth homerun Sunday, his fifth in seven games for the surging Sox, Nixon had amassed 51 RBI and 100 hits in a town where the press was calling for his head three months earlier. And as Boston Hitting Coach Jim Rice continues to perfect the rookie outfielder's swing, the club sees Nixon filling their right field spot for many years to come.

As the Sox went to war with once-feared Toronto last night behind staff ace Martinez, they held a five-game wild card lead over Oakland and sat a ~~one-game~~ game behind New York in the East. And with the bevy of young superstars on Jimy Williams' roster, the thick of the pennant race is a spot they'd better get used to.

Write for sports!

Religion aside, Terps' Goodman has to shine

By Michael Wilbon
Washington Post

After all had been said and done, Tamir Goodman felt that the University of Maryland basketball coaches weren't as high on him as they had been months ago.

He was right.

But that doesn't mean something unseemly or underhanded or offensive happened in this broken engagement between Goodman and Maryland basketball.

The essence of sports is evaluation. Will he be a superstar? If not, can he be a starter? If he can't start, can he be a key reserve player? If not, will he be happy with the minutes available for the ninth or 10th man? Those are the kinds of questions that have to be asked a thousand times during the recruitment of about every single high school kid who figures on playing college basketball.

Unfortunately, a knee injury and a summer's worth of uninspressive play led the great majority of college basketball coaches in America to conclude Goodman isn't a phenom, that he's not a franchise player at Division I level. I'm one of the people in the apparently dwindling number who still believes Goodman, a senior at Takoma Academy in Takoma Park, Md., has special talents. But that's beside the point. Regardless of what you hear to the contrary, the University of Maryland did not renege on its scholarship offer to Goodman.

What happened is Coach Gary Williams warned Goodman that Goodman might be an eighth-man kind of player. And Goodman, figuring his skills will shine brightly again once his knee is well, said to himself: "You know what? I'm better than that. I don't need to sit on the bench at Maryland."

I don't blame Goodman for telling Maryland, thanks but no thanks. Probably, he did the right thing.

But I also don't blame Williams for taking a real close second look, and saying, "Kid, you're welcome here, but we're not sure how good you'll be and there are no promises."

That's sports. Coaches evaluate. Players accept the evaluation, try to prove the coaches wrong, or leave. Sometimes coaches are right, sometimes they're wrong.

The mistake for which Williams has to be held accountable is offering a scholarship to Goodman without seeing him play more than a time or two. It seems Williams, like virtually everybody else, got caught up in the hype surrounding Goodman and hastily offered him a spot. Williams should have been more deliberate. Also, he and his staff should have spelled out in very specific terms how the player, the team and the coaches would deal with an Orthodox Jew not playing on Saturday afternoons. That would have saved Goodman the embarrassment he surely feels now.

Still, it largely comes down to the evaluation of, "Is he good enough?"

Look at what has happened in Denver with the Broncos. Bubby Brister, who in his backup quarterback role was instrumental in getting the Broncos to two consecutive Super Bowls, figured the starting job was his after John Elway's retirement. It's safe to assume Coach Mike Shanahan agreed with Brister when training camp opened. But after evaluating every practice snap, every preseason throw and handoff, after trying to project how the personalities of Brister and Brian Griese would affect the team, and be affected, by starting, Shanahan changed his mind. Griese became the starter.

Should Brister be angry at Shanahan? Of course. He has every right to think that Shanahan was disloyal, that he was stabbed in the back. But do I blame Shanahan for starting Griese? Nope. I probably would have made the same decision.

The shame in Goodman's situation has nothing to do with what Williams did or what Goodman has decided, or what the coach might have said to the recruit's mother, blah, blah, blah.

The crime is in the unnecessary hyping of a high school athlete.

A very successful Division I basketball coach for whom I have great respect told me this past week: "We [coaches] hype a guy because we want him to go to our school. So we'll say almost anything during the recruiting process."

Worse than the college recruiters are the newsletters that fawn all over a kid, the family members who keep telling him how good he is, the media people who make a 16-year-old high school junior seem as important to the future of basketball as the second coming of Wilt Chamberlain.

Goodman was a sitting duck. Every magazine, newspaper and TV network of note came calling. CBS had a network crew at the Five-Star Camp to follow Goodman a few weeks ago. T-shirts with the kid's picture were being sold at one game I attended. In the camps this summer, Goodman found himself facing determined, and somewhat resentful, competitors. The Division I coach said, "He faced kids who said to themselves, 'that kid's going to Maryland on scholarship?' They recruited him and not me?' And then those kids went after him. It happened all summer."

I feel for Goodman because he didn't deserve any of this. In the few times I've been around him, he's been nothing but a sweet, earnest, agreeable young man who loves to play basketball. He's like five million other kids, his age, with one exception. He's an Orthodox Jew. That makes him a curiosity.

My personal scouting report on Goodman is that he is better at passing a basketball than 98 percent of the high school kids I've ever seen. I know he's 6 feet 5 and only 150 pounds. But if he has that one skill, passing instinctively, he will help somebody's college basketball team.

Sunshine State holds key to rest of nation's BCS

By J.A. Adande
Los Angeles Times

FLORIDA – The exact city doesn't matter. It could be Tallahassee or Gainesville or, once again, Miami.

Forget the complicated bowl championship series calculations. The easy-to-remember formula for winning college football's national championship can be broken into two parts: be from Florida or beat a team from Florida.

It has been that way for most of the 1980s. In the 1991 season, Miami won The Associated Press poll. In 1992, the first year of the old bowl coalition, Alabama beat the Hurricanes in the Sugar Bowl to win the national championship.

The next season, Florida State beat Nebraska in the Orange Bowl for the national championship. Nebraska won the next two championships by defeating Miami and Florida in bowl games. In the 1996 season, Florida rebounded to win a championship (beating rival Florida State in the Sugar Bowl to cap it).

Last season Tennessee pulled off a rare double whammy, beating Florida in the regular season and Florida State in the Fiesta Bowl to claim the title.

Just let the Florida schools play a round-robin tournament among themselves, then have the winner take on the top-ranked team from the rest of the country. You can't say the current system makes any more sense.

The best of the Florida schools almost always stands among the best in the country. If a team from outside the state can beat them, in its mind, that school would have as legitimate a claim to the national championship as anyone.

Top-ranked Florida State avenged its only 1998 regular-season defeat by beating North Carolina State, 42-11. Penn State kept its championship hopes alive with a late touchdown for a 27-25 win in Miami. And in the nightcap, Florida held off Tennessee, 23-21.

The odds are pretty good that we'll see either Florida State or Florida in the Sugar Bowl for the matchup of the top two teams in the BCS rankings. The only reason we know we won't see both of them there is because they face each other in Gainesville on Nov. 20.

Miami threatened to crash the party too, until Penn State quarterback Kenny Thompson found Charlie Fields for a 79-yard touchdown pass play with 1:41 remaining to snatch what would have been a 23-20 Miami victory away from the Hurricanes. But the Hurricanes still can alter the national championship picture when they play the Florida State in Tallahassee on Oct. 9.

The truth is, the Florida schools have indelibly etched their marks on the portrait of college football. They are blessed with an abundance of in-state talent. The best athletes in Florida are focused on football more than say, basketball.

The Florida schools even changed the rules and politics of the sport. Many credit the trash-talking Hurricanes with bringing about the excessive celebration and unsportsmanlike conduct penalties that currently occupy the rule books.

The BCS supporters like to say that it brings an added excitement to each Saturday, that the college football season is really one big playoff or tournament.

The NCAA needs more work on its method of determining a Division I-A champion. Meanwhile, the rest of the nation has to come up with new ways to compete with the schools from Florida.

sometimes I wonder if he ever really got over it."

He was once a good enough pitcher to be drafted by Milwaukee in the first round of the now-defunct winter draft in 1983. But even then, the left-hander was throwing "only" 87 mph.

One of the most amazing things about this amazing story is that how that speed increased over the past 10 years with...what?

Said Morris: "I have no idea. Maybe it is just God saying it's my time."

Said Tampa Bay Manager Larry Rothschild: "The way I figure, his increase in velocity is due to one of three things. Either it was a surgery, or something from his chemistry class, or throwing all that batting practice to those kids."

Even though he didn't throw as hard, he did quick damage to his elbow and shoulder after being drafted, and his first career lasted only three full seasons. When surgeries finally sidelined him after the 1987 season at age 23, he wanted to get as far away as possible.

"He couldn't even watch a major-league game, because somebody he once played with would be playing, and it would kill him," Lorrie said. "I really felt for him."

But life went on, and he received his education, and took out his athletic frustration as a punter at Division II Angelo State (Texas), and then became a teacher.

And then came that silly bet.

The only reason he tried out for the Devil Rays is that he heard their tryout being advertised on the radio one day when he was driving to his father's home in Brownwood. Because his wife worked that day in the admissions office at Angelo State, he had to bring the children to the tryout with him.

And because he was considered such a joke by the Devil Rays, the scouts brought in a second radar gun after the first one registered a 86-mph reading. He threw 12 consecutive pitches at 98 mph that day, but still they didn't believe, so he was summoned back a couple of days later to see if the arm had fallen off.

In the pouring rain, he threw that hard again, and the Devil Ray scouts were believers, even if they were afraid to recommend that their bosses sign somebody older than they were.

"As amazing as this is for everyone else, it's more amazing to those who live it every day," Rothschild said.

Morris had decent success in the minor leagues, striking out 22 in 28 innings with a 4-2 earned-run average, as good as could be expected considering he had been thrust into a world of guys 10 years younger.

Nobody asked me to go out after games with them, because I think they sort of knew," Morris said. "I would just go home every night and watch TV."

Then, before he knew it, he was on that TV walking to the mound Saturday to face Royce Clayton in the eighth inning with two out and a runner on first and in an eventual 6-1 loss.

LA's fate for new franchise in hands of billionaire Davis

By T.J. Simers
Los Angeles Times

Billionaire Marvin Davis, apparently the last gasp if Los Angeles is going to get an NFL expansion franchise, met with Commissioner Paul Tagliabue Monday night in San Francisco and is mulling the prospect of spending more than $1 billion to buy a sports legacy for himself and his sons.

Davis, who has a reputation of being unable to pull the trigger on other sports deals, will face a moment of truth Friday when he must make a $250,000 payment or give up the option on nearly 100 acres of land at Hollywood Park.

At the same time, it's known that Davis, along with sons, Gregg and John, met again last week with John Elway, the retired Denver Broncos quarterback. There had been preliminary discussions with Elway's representatives to determine if its feasible to give Elway a 10 percent ownership interest in the team in exchange for his working as team president.

The NFL said a consummated deal with Elway, while maybe not carrying much wallop with voting owners, would be another clear signal to the league of Davis' intention to proceed.

The NFL appears to be moving toward a deal with Houston, but it remains open to anyone who wishes to embrace the "fool's theory" of sports ownership in Los Angeles. According to the theory, there will always be someone with a big enough ego, and wallet to match, who will forget good business sense and pay the premium to become an owner of a sports franchise.

To date, there has been no one in Los Angeles to match that description, much to the puzzlement of NFL owners, who have grown weary and even angry with the nation's No. 2 market.

Although NFL representatives remain skeptical, Davis has told them, that at this late stage in his life the $741 he would like his family to be responsible for bringing football back to Los Angeles in a stadium built on land at Hollywood Park. He has told NFL representatives that he has the money to make it happen, and will not ask the league to contribute $150 million to the construction of a stadium, as has been proposed by Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum backers.

He has also told the league that the ownership of the team will rest in the hands of his sons.

The NFL has said solid ownership is essential to having a successful franchise in Los Angeles again, and admits privately it has its doubts about Davis, whose name has been linked previously to goanywhere attempts to buy the Denver Broncos, put a professional baseball team in Denver, purchase the Dallas Cowboys, and the Oakland Athletics. He reportedly also was interested in buying the Los Angeles Dodgers at one point.

In a 1991 "Business Week" article on Davis, Jeffrey B. Fugsbun, an entertainment analyst, was quoted as saying Davis "has danced around the altar more than anyone else in Hollywood. You have to be pretty skeptical about anyone who never seems to take the plunge."

The league said it also has no grasp on John and Gregg Davis, indicating background checks have yet to be done.

John is the founder of Davis Entertainment and producer of more than 50 movies. Gregg followed his father's lead into the oil business.

Davis has repeatedly refused to publicly discuss his interest in football in Los Angeles, telling confidants that the NFL asked him to remain silent.

The NFL said it has not advised Davis to remain quiet.

The Davis sons, who are also being advised by attorney and real estate developer Neil McCarthy, did not respond to efforts to contact them.

The NFL, while maintaining it still has interest in finding a suitable owner, says money is really the only thing that will talk in Los Angeles' favor, and said Davis will need to step forward before the league's Expansion Committee meets in Atlanta on Oct. 5.

The NFL, looking for an expansion franchise fee of about $625 million, has begun negotiations with prospective Houston team owner, Bob McNair. The league would like to reach an agreement, and then present McNair's bid to the committee, expecting that the committee would recommend its acceptance to all 31 owners Oct. 6.

A successful deal will require 24 votes, and there is still some concern that the league might elect to remain at 31 teams at its Atlanta meeting, and wait for a better franchise bid, from Houston or Los Angeles, at a scheduled November meeting in Chicago.

Tagliabue met separately with Coliseum partners Eli Broad and Ed Roski this weekend, but the Coliseum appears to have lost support of most NFL owners, among them the most influential Carolina's Jerry Richardson, co-chairman of the Expansion Committee.

Richardson has shifted his attention to Houston because he believes he was deceived by Broad and Los Angeles officials, who promised the cooperation of Mayor Richard Riordan and the Los Angeles business community. The league believes that never materialized.

Breakdown to breakout for 'Skins has NFL in fog

WASHINGTON – One morning, you roll over to turn off the alarm clock, fall out of bed and crunch the cat. At breakfast, you swallow corn scrambled eggs into a three-alarm fire. Going to work, you smash your car.

The next morning, you feel exactly the same. But that lottery ticket you buy at the convenience store turns out to be a million-dollar winner. At work, you get promoted. On the way home, you jot down an inspiration that keeps running through your brain. It turns out to be the cure for the common cold.

So, who are you?

Why, you're the Washington Redskins, of course.

I bet we're kind of hard to analyze," said Norv Turner Monday.

Bill Parcells may have a nervous breakdown this week. The lets-coach-it-a-nut for preparation. How's he going to get ready for the 'Skins? All they have to do to try his brain is make sure he gets tapes of both their games. How do you cook up a game plan for Jekyll and Hyde?

From week to week, the Redskins have no idea who they are or what they'll do next. In three hours on Sunday, with a 30-21 win over the Giants in the Meadowlands that showed the NFL they moved from being one of the most infuriating teams in football to one of the most fascinating. Now, for the rest of this season, every opening kickoff will bring the same thought to mind: Who's going to show up? Good Washington or Bad Washington?

A week ago, many Redskins felt they'd disgraced their uniforms. Now, it's the New York Giants who feel that same shame.

I did not see this coming," said Giants Coach Jim Fassel, quoting Wile E. Coyote.

Hard as it seems to believe, just eight days ago the Redskins suffered perhaps their most embarrassing home-field collapse in history to the hated Cowboys, no less. Then, they rolled up perhaps the most impressive road rout since the 1950s. And they did it to the almost equally despised Giants. Yes, biggest blown lead at home. Ever. Highest point total on the road. Ever. Back-to-back. Against your two primary division rivals.

After reviewing the films of Sunday's game, the Redskins did on Monday what you'd expect. They fainted. When they regained consciousness, they decided to lie. "After looking at it all again," said Turner, "I realize we can get better in every aspect of the game. We have a lot to work on."

Stop it, Norv, you're killing me. The Redskins, in perfect health and hitting with the fury of deeply wounded professional pride, played what quarterback Brad Johnson called a "nearly flawless" game on offense. Except for recovering two fumbles and intercepting two passes (returning one for a touchdown), the defense didn't do much, either.

The full and perplexing range of this team's personality probably will be on display all season. You think the Redskins will simply "find themselves" and establish a predictable pattern for a whole season? Dream on.

The Redskins' dominant character trait under Turner has been the same split personality they've shown in the last two weeks. Their only consistency has been inconsistency. In years when they started 7-1 or 6-2, they collapsed late and missed the playoffs. Last season, they folded early (0-7) to avoid the rush. This season, they've taken their fire or ice tendency to its extreme.

On a team that's so emotionally exhausting, it's only fair to enjoy the good times. At the moment, this team is happy about lots of things. Marco Coleman and Larry Centers have brought veteran leadership. Who says you can't import character? George Allen did it. Stephen Davis has back-to-back 100-yard rushing games. Rookie tackle Jon Jansen looks like the first Hog of the 21st century. Champ Bailey can cover all of Northern Virginia.

But the reason this team is exciting, and it is very excited about itself, Dallas debacle or not, is Brad Johnson. As long as he remains upright, everything is uptight, outtasight.

Ryder Cup return to States brings back memories of touchy subject

By Thomas Bonk
Los Angeles Times

BROOKLINE, Mass. – Remember Valderrama?

For the U.S. Ryder Cup team, it's hard to forget the Spanish place.

Right there on the Costa del Sol, on the doorstep of the Mediterranean, a stone's throw from the Rock of Gibraltar, on a course in the middle of a bunch of cork trees, the United States got popped, rocked, overrun and generally routed.

Sure, the final margin was only one point, 14-13, but Europe's victory was a lot bigger than that and its impact has been just as large.

It has been two years since that defeat, but it's not something you can put out of your mind easily.

Consider, for instance, the case of the captain. Tom Kite put on a happy face right up to the event, smiled his way through it, then when he was criticized for his Mr. Feel Good approach in the face of a crushing defeat, he went the other way and needed months to find his sense of humor again.

"When we lost, I couldn't figure out how we lost," Kite said. "I still can't."

Of course, veteran Ryder Cup followers have no such problems. The U.S. defeat followed a familiar formula.

You take an over-hyped, heavily favored team into a format that it doesn't usually play and it gets surprised by an overachieving, underappreciated bunch of semi-nobodies.

Yeah, that will do it just about every time. So when the Ryder Cup begins Friday at the Country Club here, we're going to relive some very good memories or very bad ones.

There have been other U.S. defeat – Europe has either won or tied and retained the Ryder Cup five of the last seven times the sides have met. So even though the United States was not entirely unaccustomed to losing in 1997, the whole Valderrama experience was so, well, upsetting.

From the start, not much went right for the U.S. team.

Kite wanted his players to get accustomed to the course, but only three did – Mark O'Meara, Tiger Woods and David Love III. He studied the local weather charts for the tournament dates for the previous 10 years and found it to be as dry as the sand in a bunker. It rained all week.

At the end of the second day's play, it was all but over. Europe had a 10-5 lead, which meant the United States had to get nine points in the 12 singles matches on the third and last day. The Americans got eight.

Kite's team was loaded with the winners of three of the year's four majors (Woods, Justin Leonard and Love) and they produced a 1-9-3 record.

That obviously came as a great surprise to Kite.

"Or maybe the biggest surprise was that our only three players with winning records were Scott Hoch, Jeff Maggert and Lee Janzen," Kite said.

Actually, the biggest surprise was that Seve Ballesteros couldn't be everywhere at once. He seemed to be. While Kite was busy giving friends and Michael Jordan rides on his golf cart, like a part-time chauffeur, the European captain was tearing around Valderrama like a madman.

It was left to Ballesteros to offer the final word. He was asked to explain the result.

"This is the game of golf," he said. "Sometimes there is no explanation."

There was a very simple explanation for a lot of what went on. The European players putted better. Maybe it was because they knew the course better, the Volvo Masters made a regular stop there, but the ball sure went into the hole when it had a chance. The same was not true for the U.S. players.

Woods actually putted his ball off the green and into the water at No. 17 in a four-ball match, and Woods and O'Meara wound up losing to Lee Westwood and Nick Faldo, 2 and 1.

Brad Faxon, the team's best putter, went 35 holes without a birdie.

Phil Mickelson missed a seven-footer at No. 13, an eight-footer at No. 14 and a six-footer at No. 17.

When the second-day's play finally ended, about 30 minutes before a deluge, the whole Ryder Cup thing had acquired a new name: Shock at the Rock.

Anybody can lose, Woods said.

"It's called golf," he said. "You can't always win."

Well, it's still called golf, but this time, the maxim is a little different for the U.S. players. They're trying to prove you can't always lose.

King me: boxing examined months after biggest hoax

By Steve Springer
Los Angeles Times

LAS VEGAS – There were three big winners Saturday night in this gambling mecca. Don King, Felix Trinidad and Shane Mosley.

And two big losers, Oscar De La Hoya and Bob Arum.

"The lights are going out in Arumville," chortled King after the fighter he promotes, Felix Trinidad, had won a majority decision over De La Hoya, the franchise player of Arum's Top Rank boxing organization.

King's declaration is a slight exaggeration. And isn't that a surprise, coming from him. At 2b, with only one loss to tarnish his otherwise golden career, De La Hoya still figures to have a lot of fight left in him. And Arum still has other champions, like Floyd Mayweather and Erik Morales, to promote.

But there is no denying that Saturday night's decision at the Mandalay Bay Events Center has turned the boxing world upside down.

A day later, the aftershocks are still rumbling through a sport where unexpected twists and unwanted detours are the rule.

THE WINNERS: Last spring, King's many enemies were doing the chortling. The end finally seemed at hand for the slippery promoter who has made more comebacks than Bill Clinton.

King was coming off the controversial draw between Evander Holyfield and Lennox Lewis in a fight for the undisputed heavyweight championship. Charges that King had influenced the decision had triggered a series of investigations. A grand jury in Newark was closing in on King. His biggest cash cow, Mike Tyson, had deserted him. Holyfield's career seemed about over. Trinidad couldn't get out of the shadow of De La Hoya. But now, another close decision has vaulted King back into command.

And if Holyfield should beat Lewis in their November rematch, King's comeback will be complete.

Ironically the close decision that benefited King came in Las Vegas, considered De La Hoya's home turf. The Nevada State Athletic Commission silenced all those who insinuated that their judges will always favor De La Hoya, the man who can generate more for money for Vegas than any non-heavyweight around.

"This is the greatest city in the world," King said, "the greatest commission, the greatest judges. This was a fight of good over evil.

"If you listen to Bob Arum, he wants to take the judges to the guillotine."

Although the entire commonwealth of Puerto Rico was waiting to greet Trinidad with a hug of its collective arms Sunday, he remained in Las Vegas long enough to meet with media.

And, after taking his shots at De La Hoya Saturday night, Trinidad couldn't resist taking one more on Sunday in a press conference at the Las Vegas Hilton.

"Oscar is quick and fast with the hands," Trinidad said through an interpreter, "but he showed me last night that the nickname Chicken De La Hoya is deserved."

Trinidad was referring to the fact that De La Hoya quit fighting and backpedaled in the final three rounds, thus giving away the lead he had amassed on the judges' scorecards.

Had De La Hoya hung onto that lead, he was expected to give up his World Boxing Council 147-pound title and the International Boxing Federation 147-pound title he won from Trinidad and move to 154 pounds where lucrative fights awaited De La Hoya with David Reid, a 1996 Olympic gold medallist, and Fernando Vargas, a fellow Southern California Mexican-American, who needs only hear De La Hoya's name to begin anew his mantra of hatred for the East Los Angeles product.

But according to those around him Saturday night, De La Hoya will stay at 147 pounds for now.

And that probably means a fight with Mosley, who comes from Pomona.

"We are interested in Mosley and perhaps a rematch Ike Quartey," said Arum after Saturday's fight.

Before Mosley can think about a golden payday against the Golden Boy, he has a big test of his own Saturday night when he jumps two weight classes, from 135 to 147, to take on a formidable challenger, Wilfredo Rivera, in Temecula, Calif. If the unbeaten Mosley shows he belongs at 147 by beating Rivera, look for he and De La Hoya to meet, perhaps late next spring.

THE LOSERS: De La Hoya's mood shifted back and forth Saturday night in the hours after the fight. At the news conference, he seemed upbeat. He smiled, he laughed and he blasted the decision, even pulling out a sheet detailing the punch stats to show that he had the edge on Trinidad in terms of punches delivered.

But then, he also talked about examining his options and perhaps taking a year off.

There are many options, many questions, but no clear answers.

While others talk about a Mosley fight or a rematch with Trinidad, De La Hoya must first look inward at himself and his camp. There has always been turmoil on Team De La Hoya, with managers and trainers coming and going. But, in the end, everything always came out right.

This time it didn't. And De La Hoya, who earned a guaranteed $21 million Saturday night, and has contracts with a long list of sponsors, must figure out where he went wrong if he hopes to hang onto both his financial empire and his grip on the public.

Could trainer Robert Alcazar or trainer/advisor Gil Clancy have given better advice in the corner?

"I thought Oscar was so far ahead," Clancy said, "that the only way he could lose was on a knockout. I thought it wasn't necessary for him to win the last three rounds."

If Clancy told De La Hoya that in the corner, he may well be fired. And probably should be.

As smoke clears, The Golden Boy believes that clinic in ring told truth

By William Gildea
Washington Post

LAS VEGAS – The outcome of the Felix Trinidad-Oscar De La Hoya welterweight title unification bout proved intriguing from the day it was scheduled because it appeared almost too close to call. The betting at Mandalay Bay remained even up to fight time. Boxing experts were divided between the two champions with perfect records. But almost everyone agreed that De La Hoya would get the decision if the fight were close. Las Vegas has a history of favoring boxers with a touch of glamour.

The fight turned out to be close. But the outcome was surprising. Trinidad rallied over the last four rounds of Saturday night's 12-rounder, prevailing on a majority vote among the three judges. Jerry Roth scored it 115-115 for Trinidad. Bob Logist had it 115-114 for Trinidad. And Glen Hamada saw it even, 114-114. There were no knockdowns. It was a difficult fight to score because De La Hoya landed almost 100 more punches but backed up defensively much of the time while Trinidad pressed the attack from the second round.

"Now I know how Lennox Lewis felt," said De La Hoya, likening the decision to the draw Lewis was awarded after pummeling Evander Holyfield in their heavyweight title fight in New York. But few, even among De La Hoya partisans, would go that far. When De La Hoya stuck to the statistics, he had a better case. "I landed a hundred punches more than he did. What else do I have to do?"

It was clear, however, that De La Hoya wilted under Trinidad's intense pressure in the last four rounds after frustrating him in the middle rounds. Because De La Hoya did little in the crucial final 12 minutes, most observers agreed with the decision even though De La Hoya contended he had won enough rounds before Trinidad began catching up to him.

After the eighth round, the fight was De La Hoya's on all three scorecards: 77-75 on two and 77-76 on the other. But in finishing much more strongly, Trinidad landed several heavy shots to the head as De La Hoya intensified his retreat. Roth scored the last four rounds for Trinidad. Hamada gave him the last three rounds and Logist favored him in rounds nine through 11.

The winner looked like the loser. Trinidad suffered a smashed nose and a puffed eye in winning for the 36th straight time and adding the World Boxing Council's 147-pound title to the International Boxing Federation title he has held for six years. He refused to meet the media afterward, saying in the ring after the decision, "I always said from the beginning that I was the number one welterweight. I was going to prove it and I did tonight. It took me time to get through my game plan but in the last four rounds he was on the run."

Sunday, in a news conference, Trinidad said, "He showed what everybody had said he was, Chicken De La Hoya."

De La Hoya, with but a few scrapes on his face to go with his ever-present smile, declined the decision that ended his streak at 31 victories. "I felt I had it in the bank. I really, really did, I swear," he said when asked about his lack of offense in the late rounds. "I really felt he was hurt two or three times. But still the strategy was not to take him out and knock him out. I was thinking of just boxing."

Changes already made in Baltimore, O's Miller already talking past tense

By Joe Strauss
Baltimore Sun

ARLINGTON, Texas – Speaking of Cal Ripken's breakneck run at 3,000 career hits, Baltimore Orioles Manager Ray Miller recently contemplated its significance and said succinctly, "I'd like to see it happen."

An enigma to the end, these Orioles topped an 11-game winning streak on Sunday, the same day their postseason chances died. Sunday's three singles allowed Ripken to move to within 10 hits of the career milestone. Now, as he supervises the franchise's longest run since 1987, Miller increasingly refers to his tenure as manager in the past tense.

Miller's option for next season must be exercised or denied within 72 hours of the Orioles' Oct. 3 finale. With an announcement expected the day before the postseason begins, Miller suggests next season's team should be less dependent on bullpen "guts" in their late 50s" and more mindful of the significance of speedy position players.

The manager also implied last weekend that ownership's market-ing concerns, especially at home, influenced the way he worked his bullpen during this season's hellish first half.

"I think it's very hard to have three or four guys in their late 30s at the same time," said Miller, referring to Jesse Orosco (42), the released Heathcliff Slocumb (35), Mike Fetters (34) and even 29-year-old Arthur Rhodes. "A lot of times you looked out there and guys couldn't pitch [because of injury or wear]. You're rather limited."

Miller was reminded of how he often praised Jim Leyland for knowing when to sacrifice one game allowing a single pitcher to absorb a beating, to preserve his bullpen for the next several days.

"In Pittsburgh, Jimmy never had to worry about playing in front of 48,000 people," said Miller. Leyland's pitching coach with the Pittsburgh Pirates. "A lot of times, Leyland was playing in front of 7,000 people at home.

"The thing Jimmy was good at was getting his team back in it whether it was down six runs or not. He would bunt and hit-and-run to put pressure on the other team. Invariably, he would get the tying run to the plate late in the game. I tried those things when we weren't playing well. If we were playing good, I'd leave 'em alone."

At the same time Miller sees his managerial tenure ending, he also watches as the Orioles approach season-bests in team average and ERA. Once overmatched in close games, an expanded roster has made them potent in tight quarters.

With their remaining 14 games coming against the Texas Rangers, Oakland Athletics, Boston Red Sox and New York Yankees, the 72-76 Orioles have an opportunity to shape the postseason. A 9-5 finish would salvage a .500 record, and a 7-7 conclusion would allow them to match last season's 79-83 mark.

"We've known all along with the team we've got we could win. We just didn't," said closer Mike Timlin, who saved all three games of last weekend's sweep of the Anaheim Angels.

"We've made bad mistakes. I've lost a few games myself. I've made bad pitches. But that's done. I can think about what I did and I correct it in my head. But I can't correct it on the stat sheet. All we can do is what we did today. Shut the brain down, take a day off and crank it back up against Texas."

this outcome. In her words, "Losing to Vermont hurt a lot. They kicked our butts."

BU's coach also commented on Vermont's strong performance at the meet. He said, "[they were] trying to maximize the home course advantage."

Coach LaFreniere was surprised by the performance of the team. She stated, "Overall the performance was subpar for the team. Unfortunately, we didn't go out with a sound attitude. The team wasn't competitive at all. We certainly didn't look like the same team who won the A-10's last year."

This disappointing outturn for UMass, according to LaFreniere, was because, "They didn't have their act together. The attitude on the team was flat. There was no explanation for it." LaFreniere felt that the team ran well in practices during the week. She was very surprised with this outcome.

Although this wasn't the best performance of the season, Coach LaFreniere feels that there was a good performance by Senior Elizabeth Shepityck. She finished third for UMass and eighteenth overall. Senoir Sally Hirsch placed first for the Minutewomen and came in tenth place overall. She had a time of 18:59.

Horoscopes

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may want to be a little more unpredictable today! Keeping other people on their toes can work wonders when you are in the mood for a little fun.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You should be able to gather the facts and figures you need to put an end to financial or personal confusion by day's end.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're flirting with danger today, whether you know it or not. If you receive a warning from a friend or loved one, you're best to heed it!

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You're going to enjoy seeing things from someone else's perspective today. Look and learn and remember that there's always "another way."

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 20) – Your physical well-being depends in part on your mentalland emotional states today. Make sure you're maintaining balance in all things.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Communication may prove to be difficult between you and a friend today. Though you're used to thinking along the same lines, things are changing slightly.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) – Concentrate on getting things right the first time today, as you're likely to have little time to repeat your efforts later on.

Aries (March 20-April 19) – It's important that you don't make the mistake today of looking at a rational, professional situation from an emotional and personal viewpoint.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) – Someone close to you may accuse you of taking advantage of someone else in need. Today, you can prove that your motives are honorable.

Gemini (May 21-June 20) – What begins as a friendly contest today is likely to become something from which you can learn many life lessons, whether you win or lose.

Cancer (June 21-July 22) – You don't want to admit something to yourself that has been on you mind for some time, but today is the best possible time to face the truth.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be facing something that will grow into a major personal challenge in very little time. It's time to focus on specific skills.

Youthful stars shining bright in Boston rebirth

There's nothing like watching meaningful baseball games in late September.

For Red Sox fans in particular, the sight of the home team embroiled in a heated pennant race makes the approaching autumn chill that much more bearable. Now seems like a fantastic time to be focused on the present, and wishing beyond hope for a happily-ever-after ending to this Cinderella season.

But what about the future? Believe it or not, the Sox seem much better prepared for the seasons that lay ahead than for the eminent stretch run of '99. Not that the team has underachieved thus far; quite to the contrary, they are arguably the most fundamentally solid squad in the AL.

But this team is undoubtedly built for the future.

First of all, consider the pitching staff. Any discussion of the Sox must start with their Sir Lancelot, their Secretariat, their Rock of Gibraltar – that's Pedro Martinez, of course. While Pedro is without question the most overpowering pitcher in the game today, the "Dominican Dominator" has a weapon far deadlier than his knee-buckling curve, his leadballoon change, or his hellfire heater: his age.

At 28, Pedro has yet to truly develop as a pitcher, both mentally and physically. As he continues to work out and gain size, he will undoubtedly gain better command of his power pitches, and be able to throw harder, longer. Already among the league's best with over 195 innings pitched, Pedro's numbers in that category should increase steadily with his physical maturation (as should his phenomenal strikeout total).

Pedro's mental development should have just as dramatic an effect on his performance. Having come up through a somewhat disheveled Dodger system in the early 90's before being dealt to the Montreal Expos, Martinez never had the benefit of playing for a contender to help him develop a killer mound instinct. The lowly Expos of 1996 gave Pedro less than three runs of support per game, and he still notched 13 wins.

While it may seem like this situation would behoove a young pitcher (learning to win without run support), Pedro didn't get much work on the many intangibles that playoff-caliber hurlers need: how to pitch with a lead, when to save the bullpen, when to "cruise" on your best pitch, etc. Under Boston pitching coach Joe Kerrigan, Pedro is earning his pedigree in anchoring a contender's staff.

Injuries have forced Boston to thrust a few of its young arms into the big league spotlight this season, giving the league a good look at three guys who are sure to become household names across Red Sox Nation.

New Bedford's own Brian Rose wasted little time shouting his name across the Causeway Street rooftops, as the 23 year-old righty used his first two starts to dismantle the defending World Series Champs. While two wins against the Yankees don't a breakout season make, Rose's half-dozen victories and 47 strikeouts are solid proof that this local boy is here to stay.

While Rose provides a native flair to the Sox' staff, Korean imports Tomokazu Ohka and Jin Ho Cho bring some far-eastern flash (and some killer breaking stuff) to Boston's arsenal of arms. 23 year-old Ohka has thoroughly outclassed the competition at AAA Pawtucket, going 7-0 with a miniscule 1.58 ERA in 12 starts. After a somewhat rocky call-up earlier this season, Cho has settled down and used his nasty splitter to pile up nine wins for the PawSox.

Though neither of the Klutch Koreans fit into Manager Jimy Williams' immediate pitching plans (Ohka has been used sparingly in mop-up roles down the stretch), both should figure prominently into the Sox' rotation down the road. And as baseball's international presence becomes more widespread, it's nice to see Boston at the forefront of such a trend, instead of in its usual position as staunch traditionalist.

And while Williams and Kerrigan have scrambled all season to keep the Sox' patchwork starting rotation intact, the Boston bullpen has quietly emerged as one of the most solid in the league. Especially after closer Tom Gordon succumbed to a nagging right elbow, the Sox were forced to entrust their cherished leads to the lively young arm of Derek Lowe.

A sinkerball specialist of only 26 years, Lowe came into service with the Sox through the "gift from the gods

Stags chalk up first loss; Kenny snatches No. 300

By James Piehl
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team took to the road last night looking to improve their 4-5 season record at Fairfield. The Minutewomen brought with them the memory of last weekend's disappointing loss to conference foe Xavier. That was all they needed to pack when they sent their hosts home with their first loss while snatching a 3-1 victory as a souvenir.

Not only does UM improve their season to .500 but also they add two new records to the books. Minutewomen head coach Bonnie Kenny reached a career milestone tallying her 300th victory. Helping achieve this feat was senior co-captain and cog Jill Meyers. Not only did she help Kenny into the spotlight but she grabbed a bit of it for herself getting her 1,000th dig in an UMass uniform. This added her name to the short list of UM volleyball standouts in the 1,000 kill-1,000 dig club. Meyers joins other recent addition to the list senior co-captain teammate Kari Hogancamp and former Minutewomen stars Dionne Nash and Lesley Nolan.

UM met their undefeated hosts at Alumni Hall in Fairfield, Connecticut where they battled to victory 15-9, 15-12, 13-15, 15-3.

UMass' offensive woes seemed to be continuing in the first game as the women hit a weak .080 in the win. Their hitting percentage almost doubled as the offense livened up smacking a .159 as they took game two. Despite the loss in game three the Minutewomen were still able to improve their offense with a .167 hitting percentage. Game four was when the real fireworks went off as UM smashed a dominating .407 in the lop sided victory to close out a fantastic night with a road victory and two records.

Meyers had a stellar performance last night posting 25 kills and 12 digs. Hogancamp wasn't to be shown up while she herself tallied 12 kills and a phenomenal match high 32 digs, which is just 4 shy of her career high. Sophomore Janeen DeMarte added another double-double to her stat book with 12 kills and 12 digs. Junior Jennifer Drennan saw most of the action at setter adding 44 assists to the Minutewomen offense.

Four UM athletes posted double-digit kills and five with double-digit digs in the victory.

Fairfield itself posted some phenomenal numbers in spite of the loss. The Stags had four players with double-doubles. Not to be outdone at home, the Stags also got in on the record setting night as senior Jen McLaughlin made Fairfield history. McLaughlin collected two service aces last night vaulting her to the all-time Stag leader spot with 197 career aces.

All four games saw a monstrous 223 digs and 159 kills before the Minutewomen were able to close it out in the fourth game.

UMass takes to the road again as they are set to face conference rival Rhode Island Saturday the 25th at 7pm.

Another road victory would not only improve their season record but would see them at 2-1 in the Atlantic 10 conference. This would be the first step toward the team goal of winning the Atlantic 10 Conference championships in Philadelphia.

Winning these conference matches are important as the Minutewomen "don't want to be sitting at home eating our turkey this Thanksgiving. We want to be in the A-10 finals," according to head coach Bonnie Kenny. A feat UM has yet to achieve in its time under Kenny.

They were, however, four time semifinalists from 1993-1996.

Men's X-Country on pace for success

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Staff

What a week of practice can do. The UMass men's cross country team began to show their full potential last Saturday when they traveled to Vermont to take on B.U., Albany, and Central Connecticut. The Minutemen took charge, finishing in second place, led by sophomore Ryan Corbett who finished in the top five overall, followed by sophomore Kevin Curtin who was the second UMass runner to make it across the finish line and 12th overall, and sophomore David Prasse the 3rd UMass runner to come through, finishing 15th overall. Senior Matt Ely finished 16th, and junior Thomas Stuart topped it all off finishing 18th

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Kevin Somers

Overall, the Minutemen showed a huge improvement compared to their 5th place finish in the first meet of the season. Increased practice time (which was lacking before their first meet), appeared to be a significant factor. "For the team the biggest difference was that we were actually together practicing as a team longer and got to know how well each of us could do. And when we know each other's fitness levels, we know who we have to run with to get better," said senior runner Matt Ely. "We're generally happy with how we did. It looks good for the future, we should have a pretty good season," he continued.

The pieces of the puzzle seemed to come together on Saturday for the Minutemen. The sophomore half of the team, although less experienced, took the initiative and led the team. Sophomore Ryan Corbett who finished 5th overall trailed B.U.'s first place finisher by only 1:09. In last week's meet, UMass's top runner trailed by 1:22. After only one week of practice the number is diminishing. "This year he (Ryan Corbett), has taken a big step up," said Ely. "He was our number one runner last week. I think he's going to be a leader in the years to follow. His time was one of the fastest UMass times I've seen in a couple of years."

Head coach Ben O'Brien agreed, "I thought he did a tremendous job and surpassed anything that I thought he might do in that particular event. I feel really positive about the two to three guys that have run the best race so far this year and just hope that we can get some consistency out of the whole group."

O'Brien is also counting on Ely to provide leadership and trusts he will be one of the key runners and lead the Minutemen by example this season. "I feel as though he's done a real nice job taking hold of the leadership role and weaving his influence amongst the young kids in the team," said O'Brien.

"He's accepted the front runners position very well and at the same time he's excepted the additional responsibility of leadership, passing on things to the younger kids," he continued.

"He's done a terrific job with that and I think it's going to actually help him and his running too because last year he was the supporting cast and now he's stepping the running part of it up and I think actually being a leader is helping him."

Ely has also been giving thought to The Meet of Champions. "It's going to be a very hard race. The course is extremely hilly and the competition that goes to this meet is just unbelievable. There are nationally ranked top 20 teams that go there," he reflected of the five-mile competition.

"We have to get it in our minds that we can run with the best guys and in doing that we're going to have to go out faster and stick with them for longer," he said.

"For cross country it's all about staying focused and knowing that for each mile you have to run a little harder to maintain pace, It's all about dealing with the pain while running. We have to say to ourselves, the race is 25 minutes, forget about the pain for 25 minutes and deal with it when the race is over."

The Minutemen's next meet isn't until October 2nd when they'll travel to the Bronx, New York for the Meet of Champions. Although O'Brien predicts that the team won't reach full stride until mid-season, he is hoping for a repeat of last Saturday's performance."

Texas HS coach lives boyhood dream at 35

By Bill Plaschke
Los Angeles Times

"What about your dreams?"

As with many people creeping toward the middle of a responsibility-filled life with no hurry in sight, it was a question Jim Morris couldn't bear to ask, with an answer he could no longer imagine.

Then one dusty, dripping-hot, glorious day in desolate West Texas last spring, some kids asked it for him. Morris, 35, a high school physics/chemistry teacher and coach, gathered his Reagan County High baseball team together to convince them they could make the playoffs for the first time in several years.

"Go for your dreams, go past your dreams," he was telling them. "Set your goals and ..."

"Wait a minute," interrupted a couple of his players, almost in unison. "What about your dreams."

They asked, because they knew. Morris never said it, but he showed it by the way he pitched daily batting practice, so hard that only a few of them would bat against him, and the catcher was afraid to catch him.

He would stand out on the mound, and look in at us, and throw that heat against the backstop, and we knew he wanted to be in the major leagues," student Joaquin Campos said. "You could see it in his eyes."

So they presented Jim Morris with a childish, brilliant dare. Worried that he would be setting a bad example if he refused, he took it.

"Fine," he told his team on that spring day, "You make the playoffs, I'll try out for the major leagues."

So it happened that last June, shortly after his team had qualified for the playoffs, Jim Morris found himself sitting in his dusty Olds Cutlass outside a Tampa Bay Devil Rays tryout session in Brownwood, Texas.

He was so uncomfortable, he couldn't bring himself to get out of the car. He was so unprepared, he was wearing softball pants. While other players walked to the field with their duffel bags, he was pushing one of his three small children in a stroller. While the Devil Ray scouts felt obligated to at least act interested upon registering the 70 hopeful players, they openly laughed when they saw Morris.

"They asked me if I had brought some kids to tryout," he said. "I said, 'Uh, no, it's just me.'"

When he told them his story, a former minor-leaguer who had not played in 12 years and was just paving up a silly bet with his high school team, scouts placed him at the bottom of the schedule. For two hours he waited, and watched, and almost went back home, but didn't, wouldn't, couldn't.

"I had made a promise," Morris said.

This, then, is a story about what happens when you keep such promises, especially the ones made to yourself, quietly, and long ago.

Jim Morris discovered that day that those hard pitches he was throwing in high school batting practice were 98 mph.

A month later, he was throwing 98 mph in the minor leagues.

Saturday, on a big-league mound in Arlington, Texas, completing the most charmed story in baseball in many years, he was throwing 98 mph for the Tampa Bay Devil Rays against the Texas Rangers.

Don't ask how. Don't ask why.

Just watch and enjoy, which is what Morris' wife did before the game, running down to the bullpen to see him in a real big-league uniform, bursting into tears at the sight.

Just go tell somebody about it, which is what Campos did when he became the first student to hear the news among the 3,800 residents of Big Lake, Texas.

He was called by Morris' wife at midnight. He spent the next day driving his brown pickup truck up and down Main Street, past Shea's Convenience Store, past the Tres Amigos Exxon, stopping people on the street and yelling out his window.

"Coach made it! He made it!" he shouted to his small world.

Good news for them. Good news for us all.

Jim Morris was easy to spot when he walked into the Edison Field visiting clubhouse Monday with teammate Jose Canseco to prepare for the Devil Rays' three-game series with the Anaheim Angels.

While Canseco headed directly for his locker and began undressing, Morris stopped and stared. When Morris conducted this interview, he remained standing, and staring, and fully clothed. His temples and mustache are graying. His jeans and golf shirt are plain. His dazed smile seems genuine.

To meet the oldest player in nearly 30 years to make his big-league debut is to understand that he could easily be you, or I, or your neighbor who pitches to his son in the Pinto League.

Jim Morris pitched Saturday in Texas in the first major-league game Jim Morris had seen in three years. He pitched again Monday, throwing a perfect eighth inning, retiring Jim Edmonds, Mo Vaughn and Tim Salmon in the Angels' 10-5 victory.

"This is still amazing," he said. "This is still unbelievable. I'm not sure I'm comprehending any of it."

Somebody recently asked him what sort of odds he would have placed on making the major leagues.

He politely explained that it wasn't a matter of odds.

"Chance? I had no chance," he said. "None at all. I was going to try out and go home."

It was easy to understand why. He had been there, done that, and been burned.

"Nothing ever went right for Jimmy in his baseball career," wife Lorrie said. "Nothing ever worked out, and

"The team performed very well," Lehane said. "It showed last week's performance at Dartmouth was no mirage."

In describing his winning strategy, coach Lehane said, "When the runners emerged from a wooded section after two miles, Kovalsky had established a 10-second lead. Lauren Matthews, Alicia Heisel and Jennifer Kehoe were following in close pursuit for the runnerup spot. Michaela Thompson and Kathryn Ireland then emerged from the woods, promising a 15-point shutout." In a surprising second place finish was Vermont.

The Adhoc panel, made up of students, faculty, and staff urges for more dialogue on affirmative action.

Rally supports action

By Jake Lilien

Both faculty and students of the University of Massachusetts spoke out in favor of affirmative action in the Campus Center last night.

Members of the Ad Hoc Organizing Committee for the Teach-In in Defense of Affirmative Action staged a "rally" in which all present were given the chance to express their views on stage. The committee members hoped to increase support for their teach-in, which consists of a series of lectures and demonstrations over the course of three days, September 22–24.

All of the speakers showed resentment towards the University's February decision to cut back on the use of race in admissions decisions, and the recent national backlash towards race-based affirmative action policies.

"Last spring was a bitter disappointment for many people," said Anthropology Professor Bob Paynter, a member of the Ad Hoc Organizing Committee. "People were saying that these admissions criteria would destroy a community that people at the University have been trying to create for decades."

Members of the committee shared his sentiments.

"I am a person who has benefited from affirmative action programs," said Assistant Professor of Sociology Dierdre Royster. "I can see something scary that's coming towards me. I don't want to be in the last generation of people that benefits from affirmative action."

Joyce Vincent, the director of the Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center, spoke of the benefits historically given to society's elite.

"My concern about affirmative action last spring was that students who are younger than some use wouldn't know about affirmative action, and would think that it was started 30 years ago, when in fact it started with the signing of the Constitution. Affirmative action for white Christian males [has always existed]."

"There is a movement in this country to head back towards Jim Crow," she added. "We need to stand together on this issue. For many poor people and people of color, we have not arrived."

UMass Chancellor David K. Scott was in attendance, and expressed support for the teach-in.

"I think what I see is a new day dawning and a new spirit at the University to become involved in a deep way in these issues, and I think that's a bright side," he said.

He also insisted that the University continues to use affirmative action "to the extent that it's allowed by the Supreme Court."

Students were also vocal in their support for more liberal admissions policies.

"I know a lot of people that affirmative action has helped in getting into schools they otherwise wouldn't have been able to," said Emanuel Okrah, a pre-law freshman. "There are friends of mine who would like to get into this University and affirmative action would help them. But if there's not affirmative action, then they're out of luck."

"I want to see more students involved," said Roxanne Williams, a senior Social Thought and Political Economy major, who helped to organize the teach-in. "There's people at home watching TV, and they should be out here."

Bike project pending review

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

AMHERST – Final approval for a University of Massachusetts Bikeway Connector is pending approval by MassHighway and the Department of Environmental Management (DEM), but the organizations say a lack of final reviews by the town of Amherst has placed a "freeze" on the project.

The connector would extend from UMass to Amherst and link up with the already existing Northampton bike trail.

The delayed final reviews have put the brakes on the project's development, preventing the receipt of nearly $750,000 in federal funding and slowing the bidding process, according to representative Tom Story (D) of Amherst. There is a Sept. 30 deadline to send the project out to bid, However, Story said, the reviews cannot be completed unless MassHighway places the Bikeway Connector project on the top of their priority list.

"The reason the reviews are not being done is because they're not on MassHighway's priority list," Story said. "This is all a big joke. It's putting the Bike Connector in an impossible situation."

The Bike Connector was the only non-automobile project in Western Massachusetts selected to full funding in the current fiscal year. However, according to Arthur Swift, chairman of the Amherst-UMass Bikeway Connector, the federal guidelines allow states to decide how the enhancement money is spent, once 80 percent of its total transportation budget has been allocated.

According to an Amherst Public Transportation press release, MassHighway wants rights to three parcels of land, one near Coolidge Bridge, one on Sugarloaf and one in Montague. While negotiations are continuing on these parcels, they are not near the connector and, according to Terry Blunt, Director of the Connecticut Valley Action Program of DEM, they have "nothing to do with the project."

"I'm very upset over this situation," Story said. "The way MassHighway is acting contributes to why people hate government. They have to put up one barrier after another."

MassHighway could not be reached for comment.

MassBike, a statewide advocacy group for bicycle transportation, indicates that the hitches in the process are part of a larger pattern.

James Lowenthal, coordinator of the Pioneer Valley Chapter, said in a prepared statement that Massachusetts doesn't get much enhancement funding.

"Massachusetts is always at or near the bottom of the list for spending on enhancement projects," Lowenthal said. "This year it ranked 49 of the 50 states in the percentage of funds spent on alternative transportation."

According to Swift, if the project went through, it would help serve more than 500 bicycle commuters to UMass and by encouraging more people to ride, he hopes to cut down on road congestion and protect the air in the Pioneer Valley, "the worst air quality in the state."

"The goodness is thanks to the efforts of Representative Story and Senator Stan Rosenberg, they have secured a promise to fund the project with other federal money they have," Swift said.

In addition, Swift said he received a call yesterday from Senator Rosenberg's aide stating that the project would go on MassHighway's priority list and would go out to bid by mid-November if it holds up.

Activist Randall Robinson speaks at Teach-In

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

A speech by internationally renowned activist Randall Robinson kicked off the University of Massachusetts' "Teach-In in Defense of Affirmative Action" yesterday.

Robinson is the president and founder of TransAfrica, an organization that works to shape public opinion regarding foreign policy towards Africa and the Caribbean. This speech regarded many topics, including the need for racial reparations, the importance of student activism and the positive effects of affirmative action on our society.

"Any time there is a correlation between poverty and race in a country, that country has a responsibility to that race," he said.

He described conditions at the University of California – Berkeley and UCLA, where race-based affirmative action was eliminated by voter referendum. He claimed that both schools have seen a drop of more than 40 percent in the number of black and Hispanic students.

"The University of Washington, with only two percent black enrollment, saw fit to roll back affirmative action," he added.

He condemned the forces behind these decisions, saying, "We must find a place at the American table for all of us."

"Washington D.C. is a city that is 60 percent African-American," he said, "set one day, I counted on the [National] Mall no more than three blacks. For 246 years our country practiced slavery, yet in the Mall there is not a brick, not a stone, not a monument to represent America's Holocaust.

"Slavers continued in all its effects almost until the years present," he continued. "When a nation has an

CVSA celebrates the life of African liberator

Today, at the New Africa House Resource Room, the Cape Verdean Student Alliance presents "Celebrating Our African Hero: In Honor of Amilcar Cabral's Birthday." It is the first time the event has been celebrated at UMass. All students in the Five College community are invited to attend.

Cabral, who is a revolutionary leader in Africa, led the liberation movement in Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau. He also founded and served as the Secretary-General of the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde, which helped to rid the two nations of Portuguese colonials. Cabral has also co-founded the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, which continues to struggle for liberation in Angola.

For his work, Cabral received an honorary doctorate from Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, as well as medals and recognition of achievement from regional and world organizations. He was assassinated in 1973, but his followers carried on, liberating Guinea-Bissau in 1974 and Cape Verde in 1975.

According to Edgar Barros, a senior corporate finance and investment major, who is also the treasurer of the CVSA, there will be a slide show, short video, an interactive lecture about Cabral's life and work, as well as free food.

"We are going to be doing this in front of the Cabral mural at the New Africa House that was painted by Shamek Weddle," Barros said. "This is going to be the first ever celebration of Cabral."

The CVSA, besides doing the Cabral celebration, will also hold a roundtable discussion on African Diaspore, Cape Verdean cultural night in November.

"We have 50 members right now and we are encouraging others to come," Barros said.

According to Barros, Cape Verdeans have been in Massachusetts since the latter 1800's or early 1900's, and as a result, they have a presence in Massachusetts.

"We are going to plan the first ever New England conference for all Cape Verdean student associations," Barros said.

The CVSA is planning a trip to Washington D.C. to visit the Cape Verde embassy and also are planning to put on a work shop about Cape Verdean youth violence in Massachusetts communities like Boston, New Bedford and Brockton, and how that violence pertains to immigration laws.

The CVSA, which was established at the UMass campus in 1982, seeks to preserve and develop Cape Verdean culture through effective programming.

Major Aftershocks Hit Taiwan

By Clay Chandler
Washington Post

TAICHUNG, Taiwan — Two major aftershocks hit central and northern Taiwan yesterday as the death toll from Tuesday's powerful earthquake rose to more than 2,000 and officials began calculating the damage to the economy from power and water problems affecting its key electronics industry.

Authorities called on Taiwan's citizens to contribute food and water to survivors and for caskets to help cope with mounting fatalities, which increased to 2,025 Wednesday, with 3,269 reported injured and 268 still missing.

The aftershocks, with preliminary magnitudes of 6.1 and 6.8 respectively, swayed major buildings and rattled nerves, but no casualties were reported.

More than two days after the quake, assistance remained just beyond reach for hundreds of thousands of people in the central counties of Taichung and Nantou, where the temblor struck hardest. Collapsed bridges, downed power lines and mangled roads still block relief from those who need it most.

Electricity was restored Wednesday to many buildings here in Taichung and in the capital of Taipei. But as night fell, huge sections of Taichung and Nantou counties were shrouded in darkness again. Power blackouts in some of the most badly damaged towns and villages — including Tungshi Chungliao and Puli — thwarted efforts to provide anything more than rudimentary treatment for the most gravely injured. Sporadic phone contact with those areas made it difficult for doctors to assess the extent of victims' injuries.

"If they can get here, we can save them," said Chen Wei-kung, a trauma surgeon who runs the emergency room at China Medical Hospital in the city of Taichung.

For now, however, getting there

Recycling Facts : Umass and Beyond

What's good – at UMass

Everyday we recycle about three tons of paper & cardboard
- Annually, this saves about 18,000 trees and conserves 400,000 gallons of oil.
- It also saves UMass over $69,000 every tear in disposal expense, and earns over $16,000

For every pound you recycle:
- Industry expends 17 times less energy and emits less air pollution in 10 major emission catagories than if that pound were discarded!

Remember...we do not inherit the earth from our parents, we borrow it from our children."

What's bad– as a Nation

We discard:
- Enough paper each year to build a 12 foot high wall of paper from New York to L.A.
- Enough iron and steel to continuously supply the nation's automakers.
- Enough aluminium to rebuild the entire U.S. commercial air fleet every 3 months
- Enough glass every two weeks to fill bothWorld Trade Center buildings to the top.

is the problem. Chen, who arrived at his post within a few minutes of the initial tremor and has remained there without a break since, lamented yesterday night that there has been an inverse relationship between the speed at which victims stumbled through his doors and the severity of their injuries. First came the bruises, scrapes and gashes; then the compound fractures; then the severe head injuries.

Thus far, Chun has treated more than 300 patients, the vast majority of whom have come from central Taichung – an area that escaped major destruction From Tuesday's quake. Fearing a wave of serious trauma patients once the government reopens roads to quake-battered villages Thursday, Chen has put 200 doctors and paramedics on standby. But, he said, "I have no idea what to expect tomorrow."

Blocks away at the Taichung mortuary, the concerns are much the same. By hauling in two temporary refrigeration trailers and persuading local merchants to donate food freezers, the facility has managed to accommodate the 290 corpses that have arrived since Tuesday. But director Hong Chen-chi said the mortuary is quickly running out of space. "We can only take a hundred more," he fretted. "There isn't room."

An elite search-and-rescue team from Northern Virginia and Florida rescued its first survivor within minutes of arriving. Disaster experts from Fairfax County's (Va.) Urban Search and Rescue Team and colleagues from a Miami team freed a 33-year-old man who had been trapped in a collapsed apartment building in the city of Touliu, the Associated Press reported.

Earthquake Devastation Likely to Continue to Climb

By Robert Lee Holtz
Los Angeles Times

The death and devastation caused by major earthquakes around the world can only worsen in the years to come, as growing urban development and unprecedented population growth compound the lethal effects of natural seismic hazards, experts said Tuesday.

Big earthquakes strike with the regularity of an alarm bell – with about 18 earthquakes measuring 7.0 or greater every year on average, and four or five above the very dangerous 7.6 level. So the recent rash of destructive temblors in Turkey, Greece and now Taiwan does not signify any increase in quake activity.

What has changed, however, is that more and more people are living near faults. With the global population estimated to pass the 6 billion mark this year, there are fewer unpopulated places for quakes to strike. With ever more people to accommodate, there is more multistory construction in vulnerable fault zones as well.

As a result, destructive earthquakes such as those of the last several weeks "are the wave of the future," said seismic expert Kerry Sieh of the California Institute of Technology. "There are 40 cities of a million or more people within 100 kilometers of a major plate boundary, and all those are good candidates for a large event. Our exposure to the hazard is increasing."

Moreover, some experts suggest that in recent decades the world has actually experienced a lull in the most severe earthquakes – those of magnitude 8.0 or greater. If so, even more destructive temblors are to be expected when the full eventually ends.

Although Taiwan is shaken by dozens of earthquakes every year, the tremors early Tuesday were the worst there since a magnitude 7.4 temblor in 1935, which killed 3,276 people. This week, more than 1,700 people died and 100,000 people were left homeless. At least 3,000 people are still missing.

The predawn quake was caused by the inexorable crush of two major tectonic plates that squeeze the island from the east and west at the relatively rapid rate of several centimeters a year, building up seismic energy like the tension in a coiled spring.

The disaster in Taiwan was the most recent in a series of damaging urban earthquakes in just over a decade.

Devastating tremors killed at least 16,000 people during a 7.4 earthquake in Turkey in August. At least 122 people died during a 5.8 temblor in Athens, Greece, several weeks later. More than 6,400 people died in a 1995 quake in Kobe, Japan. The 1994 Northridge earthquake in Los Angeles and the 1987 Loma Prieta temblor near San Francisco were among the most costly natural disasters in U.S. history.

Millions of earthquakes occur around the world annually. Most are too small to be felt. An average of 3,000 magnitude 5.0 quakes are recorded each year.

The destruction caused by any single earthquake is unpredictable.

Tuesday's Taiwanese earthquake, at 7.6, was roughly twice as powerful as the 7.4 quake that racked Turkey last month. But the death toll may be only one-tenth as high, in large part because construction codes in Taiwan were more strictly enforced than in Turkey, several experts said.

interest in slavery and discrimination, that government has a responsibility to compensate those who have been disadvantaged. If any community in the world is deserving of reparations, it is the African-American community."

As a further means of defending affirmative action and reparations for slavery, Robinson described the conditions at the National Cathedral School, an expensive private institution in the District of Columbia.

"The students of [this school] are the children of wealthy whites," he said. "Everything you would want, they have. When they want a Congressmen or a Senator to speak to the students, they call him and he comes, if he isn't the father of one of the children.

"A few miles across town, you see schools for children whose forefathers were slaves," he continued. "They have no materials, no money, no nothing. Nobody comes to visit them. Don't tell me that those children have the same opportunities that [the National Cathedral School] children have."

Robinson was also adamant that college-aged students become active in political and social causes.

"I'm 58," he said. "I recall like yesterday when I was where you are. Young people are the social compass of our society. Wherever we go in our society won't have much to do with the attitude of the President of the United States. What happens is the result of the activism and social involvement of our youth."

As a further message to UMass students, Robinson said, "Get an international perspective. Get out of Massachusetts!"

"Randall Robinson is a hero of mine," said Dr. Helan Enoch Page, a professor of anthropology. "He did not lose his vision by becoming fixated on personal success. He became a warrior of equality. He decided to bring a black perspective to international relations."

From the U.S.A. to the R.S.A: reflections on South Africa

Hoe gaan dit met julle? Is julle baie goed?

I recently returned from a semester (six months plus a bit more) abroad in the Republic of South Africa. I had been awaiting this trip a good 12 years, and since I've been here at UMass my interest in South Africa has grown. Since the fourth grade at Hollis Elementary School, in the heart of the hickland that is New Hampshire, I have had a great love for Africa, especially the similarities between whites and blacks who live there.

While in an accelerated reading class in the fourth grade, I read a book by Mark Mathabane (a black South African author) called Kaffir Boy, and it changed my life in a variety of ways. It stimulated a unique world-view for me and alerted me to the horrible and appalling oppressive system that is enshrined (an Afrikaans word meaning separateness). Learning about South Africa became a sort of hobby for me, something I enjoyed during study breaks and while not swimming. Through various texts, movies, news reports and the Internet, I gained a multiple understanding of South Africa (including social, political, and economic aspects) that compelled me to go there. I finally had the opportunity to do so at UMass.

I left for South Africa in January of this year along with three girls, also from UMass. Being American women and coming into a black society (a Xhosa society) where the female role is not the same as it is here, was very difficult for the three girls in my group. Being the only guy in a group of four was a bit intimidating at times, but meeting new friends soon helped me with deal with the dynamics of our strange four-person group. We all got along great, and I think that this little excursion opened all of our eyes.

My first impression of South Africa upon stepping off the plane in Johannesburg was, "Damn, it's hot!" We were dumped there in the middle of their summer, and the three hottest days of the summer to boot. We then flew to East London and were picked up and taken to the University of Fort Hare in Alice. Fort Hare is a university that, at one time or another, was the place a well-educated black person went for a university education. Now, sadly, it has been decimated to being the punch line of a joke in South Africa among the white population. The University has seen better days.

Traditionally speaking, the whites and blacks have never really seen eye-to-eye, and maybe they never will. This is all changing (hopefully) with the now post-Mandela era and the new era with Thabo Mbeki as leader. Even though South Africa labels itself as a homogenous nation, racism is still very prevalent in all areas of life.

I did virtually all of my learning outside of the classroom. I was able to witness student demonstrations on campus (where they demonstrated against the misappropriation of funds by the administration of the University) called toyi-toyi, political rallies for the African National Congress (the ANC is the ruling party in South Africa) on campus, as well as some blatant forms of racism (not only black/white but black/black as well). Sometimes, while in line at the cafeteria, the people that handed out loaves of bread wouldn't give me or the other white guy any, but the people ahead and behind us got bread. Most of the black cultures in South Africa don't see eye-to-eye.

Wes Wrightson

I was one of two white males there, and I had the privilege of interacting with 10 of the 11 official cultures of South Africa. (There are 11 official languages in South Africa.) I got to see (and in some instances participate in) some cultural activities. Most of the cultures deal with traditions: traditional healing, traditional initiation ceremonies, and traditional religious worship.

South Africa is a Third World nation with some First World qualities to it. Not all of it is townships are like Soweto and squatter camps (where whole families can carry their own living quarters on their backs for the sake of mobility). In the major cities of South Africa like Cape Town, Johannesburg, Durban, Port Elizabeth, and Pretoria – basically the locations where the white population resides – there are beautiful and lavish sections. Most of South Africa's white population resides in metropolitan areas like Johannesburg and Cape Town.

Unfortunately, Johannesburg has been cited as the most violent city in the world. Most of the white families living in and around the Johannesburg area live in gated communities, and that was a bit weird for me to see. Living in these areas requires homeowners to have a large gate, fence, security system, and (possibly) attack dogs.

I discovered tension not only between the residents of Johannesburg, but on the playing fields at the University. While at this all-black University, I chose to participate in rugby. I thoroughly enjoyed playing rugby, but I did not enjoy the people on the team. They would repeatedly ignore me in practices and not pass me the ball during games. I learned that the color of my skin made a difference in the way people saw me. It didn't matter that I was trying to at least make friends and joke around. It boiled down to them not trusting me during game time because I am white and they are black. It didn't matter that I was trying to learn their language, trying their food, and trying to assimilate into their way of life.

Part of this assimilation was talking to people and learning about the political situation in South Africa. For the first time I actually talked to people about their experiences and their families' experiences during the apartheid years, instead of reading about them in a book. I was saddened to hear how one person's father was shot execution style because he dared to voice his opinion on a certain political party. During the apartheid years (1948-1994), South Africa was under the white-dominated National Party, and the blacks were oppressed. After 46 years of harsh and damning treatment by the white Afrikaans-speaking people, the blacks finally gained their right to vote. "One man, One Vote" became the slogan for the New South Africa when Mandela was released from Robben Island.

Because of the treatment they received in the past, the blacks in South Africa have absolutely every right to feel the way they do towards the whites. Some pretty horrible stuff happened during those ugly years, things that are unprintable. Not all blacks fear and loath the whites of South Africa; in fact, there is a whole reconciliation movement going on now to heal the past and get on with the future. The Truth and Reconciliation Committee, which was set up through the efforts of Bishop Desmond Tutu, is aimed at improving the relations between blacks and whites; more specifically, between the victims and the offenders.

South Africa broadened my horizons and definitely opened my eyes up to some of the world's poverty (townships and squatter camps are some of the evidence of this) as well as to the color of my own skin in a country that is 83 percent black. I traveled throughout this country and saw the indigenous animals (elephants, lions, giraffes, rhinos, leopards, ostriches and wildebeests), and had the opportunity to meet with and befriend some really interesting and different people. Even though all history books label South Africa as a Third World nation, there are definitely some First World aspects to it. I would never trade this experience for anything in the world.

First class material

Now, please feel free to correct me. Really, if what I say is not accurate, I urge you to write a letter to the editor and say so. Actually, I don't because my editors really don't want to have to read all my whiny complaints about school but you could write me personally. I'm always pleased to hear your complaints about school.)

I may be wrong, but I'm not that terrible of a person, right?

Now, I'm the first to admit that I'm far from perfect. Quite far. I'm a victim of the first order. I have a problem with flying late. I sleep a little too much for my own good. I forget things like locking the door to my room and bringing my toothpaste back into my room after I brush my teeth. I've been mean things in my life, like letting a friend's pair of illegal pet rats roam my dorm room, and helping to move someone's mattress from their room while they were out. I mention these examples just to prove that I am not overly deluded about whether or not I have character flaws.

Chris Collins

The list of my flaws is rather large (I really don't feel like continuing it, but ultimately, though I can see my flaws, I'm leaning towards the dark side of things than the worse. Even if I was a horrible person – I don't know, a rapist or a Republican or something else equally vile (I'm kidding about the Republican thing) – it's not like you could tell just by looking at me. Right? It's not like I have horns coming out of my head proclaiming me as some sort of refugee from hell. Right?

Having beaten that particular topic to death, I'd like to tell you about the time I got to fly first class this summer. Now, mind you, I was in first class as a direct result of the fact that my parents were about to lose air miles they had earned by using a lovely piece of plastic known as a charge card.

(Anyone want to postulate what happens between the college years and adulthood that leads adults to demand free travel as a reward for signing up to use a Visa card when as college students, a free $5 t-shirt would be incentive enough?)

Anyway, because their "air miles" were going to expire, my parents were kind enough to give them to me so my flight to Chicago would be a little more comfortable. This is to say that first class (or any flying for that matter) is normally an unaffordable luxury, much like clean clothing while I'm at school.

Anyway, it was my first time in first class, and wanting to be comfortable while I was traveling, I was dressed like a college student: jeans and a t-shirt with a button down shirt worn unbuttoned over the t-shirt. I had just sat down, stowed my carry on luggage in an overhead bin, and insured that my tray table was in the full and upright position when an older women sat down in the seat that would have been next to mine had there not been an aisle between us.

She was what might have called a grandmotherly old woman if it hadn't been for her whiny voice and rather piercing eyes and the fact that at age 102 and 95 pounds (or was it age 95 and 102 pounds?) she was extremely scary looking. Within five minutes of sitting down, she had taken a long hard look at me, and in a rather loud voice proclaimed, "Lord, if this is first class, I would hate to see coach."

Now, at this point, I looked around the cabin of the airline, expecting to see some grossly negligent mistake on the part of the airline. You know, like a window was missing, or somehow a nudist had decided that it would be more comfortable to fly au naturel, or maybe there was a small mammal loose in the cabin slowly working its way through the plane, eating flight attendants, airline food, and those horrid in-flight magazines. You know, anything can happen on planes.

Anyway, nothing in the area caught my attention as being out of whack, and then it finally hit – she was referring to me. On further consideration, I was quite out of place among the conservative business suits of first class, but I didn't think that it was necessary for her to react to my presence in that way. In fact, I was hurt to consider that my presence was such a bother to her. It didn't seem to me that my presence was harming any of the other passengers. Nor did she seem to mind when I helped her out of her seat after she got tangled in her tray table.

So what's the moral of the story? I'll be damned if I know, although if I ever get a seat in first class again I will strongly consider renting a tux for the occasion.

Procrastination blues

It's 3:00 a.m. on a Tuesday night. A smoky dorm room is filled with laughter, conversation and excitement. A student sits by his computer, coughing and sneezing. Crumpled Kleenex litter the floor. The student has a sad, almost dejected look on his face – the look of a man who knows that he has erred yet can do nothing to erase his wrongdoing. This death-row inmate will get no pardon. His sentence will not be commuted. He has procrastinated, and he will pay the reaper his due.

William F. Larkin

Earlier in the week, the student knew no such pain. He was inebriated on life, laughing and having a good time. Bliss came at the cost of ignorance. Ignorance to his work, ignorance to his responsibilities. Forget the non-obligatory reading assignments; projects and papers were sacrificed to the gods of cheer and frivolity. But as the week grew shorter, so did the erudition and the diligence of the student diminish. For temptation is a dedicated associate of procrastination. They work hand in hand, pandering dreams of euphoria to those dissatisfied with their life.

Now the hour is at hand. The music and the conversation so pleasant but a few hours ago now bear with them a horrible cacophony. Fear and panic have displaced the camaraderie of socialization. The student is offered no quarter; no sanctum sanctorum to wait out the maelstrom. He must do his work amidst the chaos of the imminent deadline. Having spurned providence and scorned prudence, the student is left alone in the lion's den. The scales of equilibrium have been tipped. The excesses of the past must be atoned for. No one can help him now; he is a victim of fate.

There are few human beings alive who can say with honesty that they enjoy doing work. It takes a choice individual, blest with eccentricity and dedication, to truly have passion for that which they do. Now there are those who would try to fool you, to say that they reap satisfaction from doing work. But it is only they who are fooled, tangled in their own web of deception. They never question themselves; they never question their own blind faith in their diligence. These men and women are infrequently subjected to procrastination, yet they are not immune to it. For there are those occasions when the light of truth permeates the façade that they have created. It is the nature of life. The social politic is inevitable. Celebrations and gatherings and merriment care not for the deadline. The innate desire to give in to frivolity comes forth, and then they are victimized. Then they are deceived by temptation. Then procrastination enlists another recruit into its army of fools.

The true victims of procrastination are those who have no social stability. Those who are more concerned with their own standing amongst their peers, those who gain more satisfaction from impressing others than from impressing themselves – it is they who find themselves staring down the hilt of the deadline. For time is so fleeting for these people. They spend their hours carving their own impressions into society, while ignoring that which is their duty. But it matters not to them. Procrastination is not concerned with these lemmings, for it is taken for granted that they will fall into the fingers of frivolity, and a tight fist will fetter their fate to panic.

The procrastinators are a wretched lot, alone in their togetherness. For procrastination forges a wicked fork in the path of the frivolous fool. These academic lepers are left with a horrible choice, and neither gambit is a desirable fate. Either ignore that which is your responsibility and face the consequences of ineptitude, or wage a hard-fought war against the deadline, tearing sinew from bone and shedding the tears so engendered by panic-stricken homework.

The latter choice is obviously the more demonic fate of the two. Not to undermine the apathy of laziness, but the only punishment wrought by not plunging headlong into the abyss of deadline work is the inevitability of failure. The slaughterhouse is very conspicuous. Steps can be taken to absolve the wrongdoing, to correct the mistakes, and to rectify the situation. The work can be made up, and all is well. At least until the next deadline.

But to rally oneself against the horde, to make that Herculean effort and slay the deadline, harries the student in ways unimaginable to man. It wears away the patience and frothiness of the procrastinator. And beyond the saddening reality that such a contest so depresses a man as to rob him of what keeps him happy, it also causes a perpetual sadness, one that snowballs to a manic state. For once a man has procrastinated, fought the hard fight and walks away victorious, that man is haunted. Haunted by the memory of the struggle, the tears, the agony. And that man needs to absolve this fervor, to cleanse that tourniquet which contaminates him.

So, sad to say, even more frivolity enters the arena. Partying and socializing take higher precedence on the hierarchy of importance. Temptation becomes less of a partner, and procrastination has less of a workload. Good luck, students, in the upcoming months. You'll need it.

Fall: Hollywood Style

Adam Martignetti

So, the summer is over and studio heads are sitting back in their luxurious corner offices leisurely totaling up profits from a record breaking summer at the box office, perhaps lamenting the fact that they did not make The Blair Witch Project, but overall feeling pretty satisfied with themselves. Autumn is upon us and with it, the beginning of the so-called Fall movie season. What do these Hollywood bigwigs have planned for us? Well, that depends.

Even the way that Hollywood defines "Fall" poses many pitfalls to the casual observer. Traditionally, Hollywood thinks of Fall as the time after Summer, when atten-

What movies may come

David Troupes

The summer of '99 was a summer of surprise hits and not-so-surprising disappointments as the commercial Hollywood machine churned on figurative overdrive in a staggering fate, doing its best to suck up every last dollar (and time) students and their parents were willing to spend. The movie from the third season marks a reduction in theater attendance consequently, film studios have begun to harder to persuade cinema goers to part with their money. Often, this results in a general rise in movie quality, but it can also lead to spirited overdosing of otherwise terrible productions.

To help you sort out the worthwhile from the worthless, here's a look at some of the movies coming our way over the next few months.

Opening this weekend

Double Jeopardy

Imagine that you were falsely accused of murdering your husband, and that while serving your undeserved sentence, you find out that the man is alive, and is and raising your son without you. What would you do upon getting out? Well, if you're Ashley Judd, you hunt the man down and kill him for real. After all, you've been convicted for it, haven't you? Tommy Lee Jones plays a police officer who desperately tries to stop this from happening while helping Ms. Judson piece together what really took place. I expect Double Jeopardy to unfold with all the entertaining twists and turns of The Fugitive.

Our favorite TV shows return for another season

Watch out for scheduling changes and shining new faces

"They're baaack!" No, I'm not talking about those nasty cockroaches that are crawling around your dorm room. Your favorite TV shows have returned for another season of fun and entertainment. Some season finales left us awestruck last year, and some left us hanging in the wind. However, what we can be sure of is that in the up-coming season, all the big hitters will be coming into your homes once a week from now until May. It seems like the theme for this year is "All the answers will be revealed." You'll soon see why.

It seems like 99.9 percent of people on this campus would answer the question "What's your favorite TV show" with "The Simpsons." The answer is easily justified since it is probably the greatest series in the history of television. This season, the popular FOX animated series has a lot in store. As usual, the guest line-up is going to be incredible, including super-stars such as Mel Gibson and Kelsey Grammer. The new season of "The Simpsons" starts this Sunday at 8:00 p.m., and will be followed by the season premier of "Futurama."

FOX has another animated gem returning this week. Tonight at 9:00 p.m., the season premier of "Family Guy" will hopefully bring as much humor as the past season that began last year after the Super Bowl.

Alex McKeal's season is in full swing. The popular series that walked home with the Emmy award for Outstanding Comedy Series last week will gain many more viewers in its third season. David E. Kelley is quickly becoming the prominent force in television writing.

NBC's "must see TV" line up will return tonight starting with the season premier of "Friends." Last season ended with a drunken marriage between David Schwimmer and Jennifer Aniston's characters, Russ and Rachael. The show is coming off of its best season ever, and hopefully it will be able to keep up the momentum that made it so terrific.

At 9:00 p.m., NBC airs the season Premier of "Fraser." This will be the first time the series is ever returning without an Emmy for Best Comedy Series, and I don't think that will affect it. It has already taken its place among TV history, and will certainly be one of the best shows in the new season.

"ER" also returns tonight with a few new faces and surprises. The show will have to work hard to keep up the pace that it has had in the past few years. Now that NBC has two new dramas that promise to be hits in "The West Wing" and "Third Watch," "ER" seems to have become somewhat expendable. The truth is that it is the most watched show on television, and should not be looked at in any negative way.

Before I talk about this next show, I'll apologize. I'm a horrible horrible liar, and I guess the only way to explain the way that people have responded to me, is by quoting Ray Finkle's mother in "Ace Ventura." I should die of ghanneria and rot in hell," and I'm sorry. Last year I told you there would be a suicide on "Dawson's Creek." What I was told by a "reliable" source that I would never single out and embarrass Jacob Fanning) that Andie would be committing suicide and leaving the show on the season finale.

As we all know, Andie is still alive and kicking. However, the show did end with Dawson and Joey breaking up again. What you may not know about "Dawson's Creek," is that its mastermind and creator is gone. Kevin Williamson left the show this summer to write movies. It'll be interesting to see how the plot develops without this great writer at the helm.

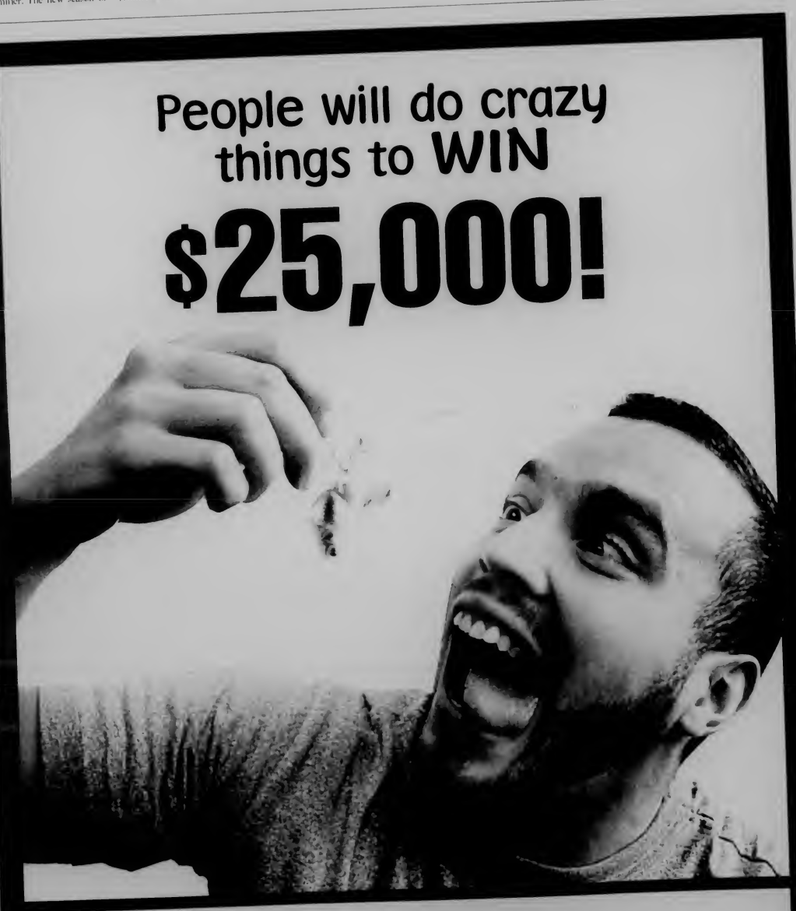
This year, FOX is forced to say goodbye to one of its most popular series of the decade. This is the final season for "Beverly Hills 90210." After a very long life, the drama series has dragged on, and worn out its welcome. However, I'm sure that FOX will be very adamant on making this the best season ever by wrapping everything up.

If you tune into FOX on Wednesday nights at 9:00 p.m., after "Beverly Hills 90210," you will not see "Party of Five." Instead, you'll see the new series, "Get Real." FOX has decided to go out on a limb, and move the wonderful series "Party of Five" to Tuesday night at 9:00 p.m., so it can be seen around the same time as Jennifer Love Hewitt's new show. "Time of Your Life." It'll be interesting to see how the move will affect the popular series, since FOX has been really quiet about it. They have advertised "Time of Your Life" a lot, but they hardly ever mention "Party of Five's" move. Look for a wedding this season, that never took place years ago, between Charley and Kirstin.

ABC returns two award winning series again this season with "NYPD Blue," and "The Practice." "The Practice" is coming off of its second Outstanding Drama Series Emmy, and "NYPD Blue's," Dennis Franz just won the award for Outstanding Actor in a Drama Series. The two shows will no doubt be filled with excitement and tension, and with David E. Kelley as the creator of "The Practice," anything can happen.

Some of your favorite shows on cable will also be making a return. WWF and WCW wrestling will no doubt stay strong competitors with football on Monday nights. HBO's award winning series, "The Chris Rock Show," is coming back for its fourth season, and "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," has proven to be even better than it was when Craig Kilborn was the host.

Other returning shows that deserve some mention, and are certainly worth a watch, are ABC's "The Drew Carey Show" and "Spin City," NBC's "Just Shoot Me," CBS' "Everybody Loves Raymond," and WB's "Felicity."



Now, as I said before, everything will be revealed this year. "X-Files" fans better sit down for this one. Chris Carter, the creator of one of the best science fiction series ever, has decided to pull the plug.

He announced earlier this year that he would write 26 more episodes, and that would be it for "The X-Files." I'm sure that the highlight of the entire television season will be in late May when Gillian Anderson and David Duchovny say goodbye. Of course, they won't leave until you know "everything."

The Big Day Off comes to Meadows on Friday featuring Everclear, 311, The Push Starts, Rane, Guster, Mighty Purple, Face to Face, Public Enemy, and Chavelle. Rane hits the Meadows for the third time this season, equal only to the Dave Matthews Band. Get your car washed by the Student Nurses Association on Saturday morning for free, although donations are recommended to support their annual bone marrow drive. That night the mellow pop harmonies of Hospital are at the Baystate, while the high-energy acoustic rock of Mighty Purple joins The Verve Pipe at Pearl Street. Local legend John Sheldon plays blues at the ABC.

Boston hosts WBCN College Rave on Sunday showcasing Ben Folds Five, 311, G. Love & Special Sauce and Buckcherry. Songwriter Erin McKeown is at Fire & Water that night. Attempt to study on Monday, but go for a change and head to Forbes Library in Northampton. The library has glass floors, hosts artifacts from Former President and Northampton resident Calvin Coolidge and is open until 9pm.

Drive. Intensity. Those aren't words you're likely to see in many course requirements. Then again Army ROTC is unlike any other elective. It's hands-on excitement. ROTC will challenge you mentally and physically through intense leadership training. Training that builds your character, confidence and decision-making skills. Again, words other courses seldom use. But they're the credits you need to succeed in life. ROTC is open to freshmen and sophomores without obligation and requires about five hours per week. Register this term for Army ROTC.

Hiero-Cryptics disappoint Valley

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

HIERO-CRYPTICS
Pearl Street Night Club
September 21

Is there any significance in the fact that this year's Hieroglyphics show was held in Pearl Street's Ballroom rather than the more intimate Club room downstairs? Probably not, if you didn't attend last year's fabulously exuberant extravaganza. Hieroglyphics, who are basically the torch bearers of an independent, "underground" hip-hop movement, have become aesthetically synonymous with dank layout of a basement-level show.

However, Tuesday night's exhibition, while still genuine in its pretense, captured Hiero's esteemed soloists Casual and Del tha Funky Homosepian performing like two deers caught in the high beams of a main stage venue. The outcome, needless to say, was acoustically chaotic, energetically bankrupt and overwhelmingly disappointing.

The crowd, who could have probably fit in my living room and survived my neighborhood's noise violation code, became increasingly disenchanted as the evening progressed. This was directly linked to the way the concert's continuity was brutally severed by the long intermission between the sets of Casual and Del. In effect, the energy level of the Ballroom read like the pulse of a marathon runner; and by the end of the night it settled into the linear pattern reminiscent of a flat line.

On the bright side, Del is simply fun to watch regardless. I have a working theory, backed by the stage presence of A Tribe Called Quest's Phife Dawg, Black Moon's Buckshot and Del, that emcees 5'8" and shorter evoke an naturally aggressive performance charisma.

Del stormed out of his darkly shadowed corner with elevated-knee steps, linguini-shaped pupils and full winter fatigue. At one point after successive rhymes, he whipped off his overcoat and in doing so, revealed his exaggerated b-boy sag which was hilariously positioned somewhere above his knees. Yanking his wrist pants upward, he began bodily bobbing to the familiar into baseline of (the informally titled old-jam) "Rap Suicide."

As he expounded he furiously paced the circumference of the platform, "I never had real friends until now/ never had to steal ends, cause that's foul/ I walk the streets with the baseball bat feeling secure but I try not to incite fights, that's immature..." At this moment, I forgot that the sound was distorted. The decjay out of sync, the lights dizzying and the crowd confused. In this rare instance I was carried by Del and captivated by raw enthusiasm. The admirable aspect of Del's performance was that he was seemingly unaware of the imperfect stage conditions and the echoed emptiness of the room.

His inebriated grin, which was maintained throughout, gave the appearance that the world beyond himself and his tightly gripped mic was non-existent. Still the large, barren Ballroom setting was quite incondusive to his charismatic style. And unfortunately for me, the imperfect conditions of the concert and the empty, unengaged encompassing world around me weighed heavily on my experience.

Overall, Tuesday night's program was more of a cryptic hip-hop occurrence than a ragingly live "underground" show.

Basically though, two types of movie protocols emerge: quality movies and box office blockbusters. So, I hope to handicap, which movies have Oscar potential and which will make a killing at the box office.

American Beauty: This opens tomorrow, so let's just say Stephen Spielberg was super-impressed and Oscar talk is already a buzz.

Double Jeopardy: Let's see Tommy Lee Jones stars in a movie about someone falsely accuses of murder? Yes, you've heard this before. The Fugitive grosses $183 million during its domestic run. Granted, Double Jeopardy is minus Harrison Ford, but Ashley Judd isn't that bad either. This will be big.

Fight Club: Brad Pitt reunites with David Fincher, who directed Oscar nominated Seven, in a truly original and equally brutal movie. This movie should win something just because it has Edward Norton in a movie called Fight Club.

Random Hearts: A sexual thriller movie with Harrison Ford? Money. Granted, Six Days, Seven Nights was a disappointment, but Ford is a well-established American institution. The Horse Whisperer, a similar type movie with Kirstin Scot Thomas and Robert Redford made $75 millikon, so look for about 50% more than that when Hearts opens.

Sleepy Hollow: Tim Burton, master of the visual cinematography, teams with Johnny Depp, again, to film this creepy but legendary tale. From the trailers, Burton even makes Christina Ricci look like a princess. And this type of thing is right up Burton's alley.

Toy Story 2: The original was a breakthrough: the first totally computer generated movie; it grossed $192 million and sequels are always bigger. Tom Hanks, Tim Allen, and Kelsey Grammer are all back. Come Thanksgiving, toys will rule.

Man on the Moon: No, not the R.E.M. song, though they will be recording the entire soundtrack. This biopic of late(?) Andy Kaufman's life is supposed to earn Jim Carrey, the Oscar nod that he so desperately deserved for The Truman Show. As for the movie, itself, I have high hopes.

Dogma: Matt Damon and Ben Affleck in post Good Will Hunting mode star in cult-hero, Kevin Smith's movie. Add Chris Rock, and Alanis Morrisette and this movie could explode with the young adult crowd.

The Talented Mr. Ripley: The cast alone has already won 5 Oscars and the nominations are twice as many. Oscar winner, Matt Damon, out of character, stars with Oscar winner Gwyneth Paltrow and runner-up Cate Blanchett in a film directed by the guy who did the Oscar dominant English Patient. With a heritage like that, this is a

Mumford

A phony psychologist sets up shop in a small town, curing everyone of their particular neuroses and exposing the audience to a slew of humorously odd characters. A largely unknown cast (Ted Danson and Martin Short are the only true stars here) and faint media buzz may grant Mumford a short run in theatres, but it will offer those who see it a sophisticated sense of humor and a story that revolves "around the subtle connections between people," says leading lady Hope Davis (Next Stop Wonderland).

Jakob the Liar

Robin Williams stars as Jakob Heym, a Jewish widower during World War II who concocts lies to raise the spirits of people living in a ghetto, and takes up the care of a young girl separated from her parents. Jakob the Liar will have to work hard to separate itself from the series of recent WWII films, especially the thematically similar Life is Beautiful.

Opening in October

Fight Club

I shard Norton plays lack, a jaded man with a rutted life who finds himself drawn into a secret society of physical violence and emotional release. Brad Pitt plays Tyler, a charismatic ringleader of Fight Club who, in his own subversive way, brings a sense of empowerment and pride to the lives of the participants. Fight Club has the feel of a modern-day parable, a brutally objective examination how alienated and emotionally smothering the world we live in can be. The characters choice to take part in such a sport, although initially unthinkable, plays upon basic truths of human nature, which may give Fight Club an undeniable, if distasteful, power.

Superstar

It looks like the current cast of "SNL" still hasn't woken up the fact that they are not funny. Molly Shannon stars as Mary Katherine Gallagher "the awkward and absolutely unfunny Catholic schoolgirl who plans to win a kiss from the hunk of her dreams, Sky Corrigan (played by the equally unwinspiring Will Ferrell). To do this, she competes in a talent contest to win a spot as an extra in a big-budget movie. We've all seen the TV sketches: we don't need to see the movie.

The Bone Collector

A crime thriller that promises great intensity and excellent performances, this movie stars Denzel Washington as quadriplegic police detective and Angelina Jolie as his younger, upstart partner. Together, the pair must track down a vicious serial killer, while overcoming his suicidal notions and her lack of experience. Can't wait, myself.

Three Kings

Like Fight Club, this is one of those movies that just looks too weird not to see. Part action flick, part black comedy, and part humanitarian drama, Three Kings is the story of three soldiers stationed in Kuwait in the wake of the Gulf War. These soldiers, played by George Cloony, Mark Wahlberg, and rapper Ice Cube, investigate stories of treasure while becoming involved in the lives of the local Kuwaitis. There will be some scenes of startlingly realistic violence, but the movie is very careful not to glorify or revel in these scenes. "You could probably count the number of bullets," says director David Russel.

Random Hearts

Harrison Ford and Kristin Scott Thomas star in a movie from the darker side of romance. The two characters loose their spouses in a plane crash, and as Ford and Thomas investigate, they discover that their ex's were having an affair. The two find themselves drawn together romantically by their mutual tragedy. It's hard to imagine how this movie could fail, with two talented stars and such a dark and intriguing plot.

Being John Malkovich

Tell me if this makes sense: Craig (John Cusack) discovers an elevator that hides a secret entrance into actor John Malkovich's head. John Malkovich (Out Air, Rounders) stars as himself; the cast also includes Cameron Diaz and Catherine Keener. I'm as confused as you are.

Bringing Out the Dead

The new Martin Scorsese film, based on a novel about an ambulance driver tormented by visions of victims he was unable to save, stars Nicolas Cage, John Goodman, and Patricia Arquette. I have my doubts about the decision to cast Cage in such an emotionally complex role, and the story will have to avoid the pitfalls of heavy-handedness and reveling in its own melancholy.

Opening in November

Sleepy Hollow

One of the scariest pieces of American folklore is brought to life by Tim Burton, a master of gothic cinematography and eerily stylized fairy-tales. Johnny Depp (in his third Burton film) stars as Ichabod Crane, the New York City constable sent to investigate a series of gruesome beheadings. Christina Ricci plays Katrina Van Tassel, beauteous damsel and romantic interest to Crane. Considering the talented and appropriate cast, Burton's directorial genius, and the terrifying potential of the legend itself, this movie guarantees all the frights and lingering imagery of a walk-in nightmare.

Anna and the King

Oscar-winning actress Jodie Foster and Hong Kong action star Chow Yun-Fat star in an ambitious remake of the 1956 film The King and I, except without any of the music and dance numbers that made the first movie so memorable. The beautiful Malaysian landscape and grand production values may more than make up for the music-less script, however.

The World Is Not Enough

Will the world never tire of Bond Movies? Probably not. This time around, Pierce Brosnan, in his third appearance as 007, saves the world from an oil-mongering tyrant with the help of buxom scientist Christmas Jones (Wild Things star Denise Richards).

End of Days

It's Arnold vs. Satan in another millennium-hype thriller. The Prince of Darkness lands on earth looking to take a mortal bride as a means of conquering the world, and Schwarzenegger, an alcoholic ex-cop, has to stop him. Groovy.

Dogma

Kevin Smith, the indie-film guru behind Clerks, Mallrats, and Chasing Amy tackles spirituality. Silent Bob style, Dogma is the story of two exiled angels trying to finagle their way back into heaven. Ben Affleck, Matt Damon, Chris Rock, Linda Fiorentino, Salma Hayek, and Alanis Morissette (as God, naturally), among others, may finally bring Smith's movies the talent they deserve.

Man on the Moon

Jim Carrey stars as the king of comedy, the late Andy Kaufman, and thereby promises a movie redefining entertainment. A soundtrack done entirely by veteran rockers R.E.M. is just icing on the cake.

Opening in December

The Green Mile

Coming from the same series of short stories as Shawshank Redemption, written by Stephen King, The Green Mile stars Tom Hanks as a prison guard who develops an unusual relationship with an unusually gifted inmate. Considering the power of King's dialogue and the wonderful adaptation of Shawshank by screenwriter Frank Darabont, The Green Mile shows incredible promise.

The Talented Mr. Ripley

Matt Damon, Gwyneth Paltrow, Cate Blanchett, and director Anthony Minghella (The English Patient) – interested yet? Damon plays a wickedly intelligent man who kills an old school friend in order to take over his privileged lifestyle; this staggering collection talent and the fascinating psychological pathology at work makes it hard to imagine that Mr. Ripley won't delight holiday audiences.

Residents of Mystery, Alaska will take on the New York Rangers, a fantasy come true, in this Fall's Mystery Alaska.

Scream 3: No. Kevin Williamson is not writing it. Yes, the ending of the second one was disappointing, due to Internet philandering, but this is Scream. The first two grossed $101 million and $103 respectively, so put this one at $102 to complete the trilogy.

The Green Mile: The Shawshank Redemption is consistently one of people's favorite movies and arguably one of the most powerful films this decade. Green Mile is another prison movie, directed by the same man, Frank Darabont, based on another Stephen King novel. Add Tom Hanks and this will be on the same level as Saving Private Ryan. Epic.

Emerging jam-band sensations Strangefolk overtake the Calvin in Noho with help from Percy Hill on Tuesday that will undoubtedly be memorable. A Strangfolk live four-song EP will be available at the show in attempts to hold the faithful over until their new studio album is complete. The nookie is in Worcester, at the Centrum, as the Family Values Tour comes to town with Limp Bizkit, Filter, DMX, The Crystal Method, and Springfield's very own, Staind.

Simmer everything down on Wednesday with Deep Banana Blackout at Pearl Street and a great double bill at the Horse with Rose Polenzani and Beth Amsel.

Some of you might have missed the calendar section's stunning debut, and if you did, don't fret as it will be appearing in every Thursday's edition. So if you are in a social crunch and need an excellent idea (we are prohibited from printing the wild and crazy ones) then review a copy of The Source, every Thursday and only in your student newspaper, the Daily Collegian.

Garcia emerging as one of the top young golfstars

By Matt Eagan
The Hartford Courant

BROOKLINE, Mass. – He has the face of a boy and the game of an assassin, which is to say, Sergio Garcia is the best hope golf has of finding an absorbing, worthy rival for Tiger Woods.

"(Woods and Garcia) add a certain charisma to the way they play and the way they're perceived on the course," said Mark James, the European Ryder Cup captain after Tuesday's practice rounds at The Country Club. "I think that's probably their main similarity apart from the fact that they're both massive talents."

How did this happen?

Two months ago, sponsors were arranging made-for-TV events trying to manufacture a rivalry between David Duval and Woods.

Now, all anyone wants to talk about is the 19-year-old Spanish prodigy who stalked Woods at the PGA last month before settling for second place.

"Sergio is one of the most exciting players that's ever come down in this game," U.S. captain Ben Crenshaw said. "He's very, very mature at 19 years old. He has a very, very wide arsenal. You can expect him just to get better and better."

Here's what has people excited. Garcia turned professional after the Masters in April. Since then he shot 62 in his first round on the PGA Tour, won the Irish Open, finished second in the PGA, earned more than $900,000 and played his way into his first Ryder Cup.

It's all beyond even his expectations.

"I was thinking about playing well, getting my European and my U.S. card, and then trying to play some good tournaments and finish some good tournaments in the top (to see) if Mark James would pick me," Garcia said. "I wasn't expecting myself to make it on points."

Even beyond his obvious ability, though, Garcia has a charisma lacking in many players.

It showed most famously in his eyes-wide-shut 8-iron from the base of a tree trunk in the PGA at Medinah. Garcia chased after the ball to get a better look at where it landed, eventually leaping into the air like a boy loosed from church trying to kick away his Sunday shoes.

"He's an inspiration to us," Colin Montgomerie said. "What he's done since he turned pro after the Masters is incredible. We're very lucky to have him on our side, and he's great with the crowd out there as well."

Garcia's game and style have reminded many of countryman Seve Ballesteros.

"We regard him as a young Seve, except that he's his own man and his own type of player," James said.

To compete with the legacy of Ballesteros, Garcia will have to make a strong showing this week, especially if he is paired with countryman Jose Maria Olazabal.

Ballesteros and Olazabal were an indomitable Ryder Cup team. From 1987 through 1995, they were 11-2-2 as a team and helped lead the European revival in Cup play.

It's a tough act to follow. For Garcia simply being mentioned with his golfing heroes is special.

"It's an honor to be following in their footsteps," Garcia said. "I think playing on the Ryder Cup team is good for my country. It's something that I'm looking forward to."

U.S. Ryder Cup squad hoping to break the jinx

By Thomas Bonk
Los Angeles Times

BROOKLINE, Mass. – History has not been kind to U.S. Ryder Cup teams. Recent history, at least, and because we have attention spans shorter than a tee, that's all that counts.

Anyway, here are the hard-luck lessons:

It is 1995 at soggy Oak Hill Country Club in Rochester, N.Y., and it is raining defeat.

This happens even though the U.S. has one of its deepest teams, has the reigning Masters champion in Ben Crenshaw and the U.S. Open champion in Corey Pavin, the golf is being played in upstate New York and the European team has players such as Philip Walton and Howard Clark, who probably couldn't caddie for the U.S. team.

It is 1997 at soggy Valderrama Golf Club in Sotogrande, Spain, and it is raining defeat.

This happens even though the U.S. has probably its deepest team, has the Reigning Masters champion in Tiger Woods, the British Open champion in Justin Leonard and the PGA champion in Davis Love III; the matches are being played on greens that should favor the superior U.S. putters, and the European team has players such as Ignacio Garrido and Per Ulrik Johansson, who probably couldn't even drive courtesy cars for the U.S. team.

So here we go again, this time at the Country Club, right here in Paul Revere's backyard, and the situation appears so familiar that the whole thing is sort of unsettling.

Yes, the U.S. team is favored, by a couple of touchdowns. Yes, some of the European players look as if they couldn't have gotten in without a ticket.

Yes, the U.S. team has 10 of the top 20 players in the world ranking.

Yes, it has been six years since the U.S. team has won and incentive has to be a factor.

But none of that may matter.

There are plenty of questions that need to be answered. Namely:

How has an underdog, undermanned, underappreciated team of Ryder Cup golfers from Europe overcome so much?

Why can't the U.S. Ryder Cup team perform up to its potential?

How has the Ryder Cup become the centerpiece of an argument that players from Europe are simply better and that the supposedly best players in the world continually lose to them in match play?

In the meantime, the U.S. must content itself with the old days, when the Ryder Cup stayed on this side of the Atlantic Ocean.

The fact is the U.S. has a 23-7-2 record in Ryder Cup play, but that record was largely built against teams limited to Great Britain. The U.S. has won only five of 10 matches since the competition was opened up to continental Europe in 1979, and Europe has either won or retained the Cup in five of the last seven meetings.

Chances are these Ryder Cup matches are going to be the most memorable ever. It has been pointed out that the Ryder Cup became a lot more interesting when a U.S. victory wasn't the foreordained outcome. Check. Now there's a chance the Ryder Cup will be less interesting if there isn't a U.S. victory.

All the fuss is about that Ryder Cup trophy, which is only 17 inches tall and weighs slightly more than four pounds. Who is destined to hoist that thing Sunday? Recent events tell us it's going to be the European team. That's history.

Still the Ryder Cup may be trying to tell us something. Dick Coop of the University of North Carolina is a sports psychologist who has worked with such golfers as Payne Stewart and Pavin, among others.

Coop also was the one who introduced a skinny kid who played basketball at North Carolina to the game of golf. That would be Michael Jordan.

Lots of baseball action as the season continues towards fall

I admit it. This baseball season has won me over.

I started the season already writing off the season for the good old boys from Beantown, also protesting the price hikes on tickets.

Then, as the season got going, it became harder and harder to not like the Sox. I am the type that when NHL preseason starts, baseball season is over.

Well, this year is different. There is usually one tight race in the majors come this time, but this year there is five. Yes that is right, five (AL East, NL East, NL Central, and the 2 wildcards).

That has been a major reason that has kept most people watching ESPN every night, reading the stat sheets and virtually on the edge of their seat everyday.

Last year it was the home run race between Sammy Sosa and Mark McGwire that peaked the interest of the people, but this year is different.

ESPN.com took a poll on Wednesday that proves my point exactly. The question they asked was "Which is the most intriguing baseball race?"

Of the 43,830 that responded, almost 31 percent said the Mets-Braves was the most intriguing. The Red Sox-Yankees race tallied close to 21 percent, while the Sosa-McGwire race did in third with just under 20 percent. The Astros-Reds took up the rear with nearly nine percent.

There are solid reasons why these races are so watched. The Sox-Yankees series is arguably the best rivalry in baseball. We haven't seen this much heat since those damn Yankees broke the hearts of Boston fans when Bucky Dent killed the Sox with a clutch homer in 1978.

As for the Braves-Mets series, the Braves have owned this decade and have basically been a lock to win the division every year. Well, the Mets have had other plans this year.

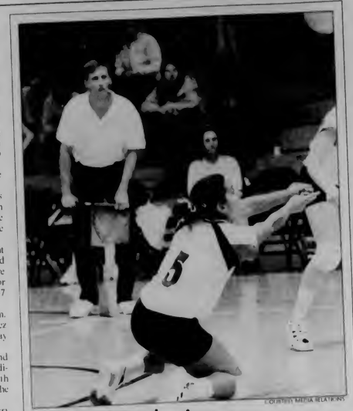
As of Wednesday, the Braves lead is two games – and the two teams will still play four more times after today.

Another reason this year has been interesting is trying to figure out the individual awards. In the American League, the Cy Young Award is clearly going to Pedro Martinez, but who will win it in the National League?

Or how about the Most Valuable Player award? There are many candidates for each of these.

I believe the NL Cy Young race is down to five pitchers – Randy Johnson of the Arizona Diamondbacks, Kevin Millwood and Greg Maddux of the Atlanta Braves, Mike Hampton of the Houston Astros and Kevin Brown of the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Johnson should get the nod because he has had a great year, striking out 342 batters on route to a 15-9 record and a 2.55 earned run average. Of those nine losses, six were tough luck losses in which the offense couldn't score for him. Millwood should be the runner-up here with and 18-7 record and a 2.78 ERA.



As for the AL MVP, everybody has a different opinion. Most people think that it will come down to Pedro Martinez and Rafael Palmeiro. Some say Derek Jeter, others say Pudge Rodriguez, but my choice is Nomar Garciaparra.

He has carried the load with the loss of Mo Vaughn and does not have the support behind him that the other candidates have. Take this past week, he went 10-for-14 with three homers. He is now nine points ahead of Jeter for the batting crown.

In the NL, I'd give it to Chipper Jones over Larry Walker because he has carried a team that has been plagued with injuries, and he has the best finish of all the candidates with a .321 batting average and 43 homers.

Now that you know my picks, what are yours?

NFL replays are causing havoc for all teams

By Paul Attner
The Sporting News

Referee Gerry Austin is sitting in the officials' room, minutes before the start of the Steelers-Ravens game.

"I hope there aren't any replays," he says to himself.

Replay assistant Bill Reynolds is standing in the instant replay booth, three stories above Austin.

"You never want a replay, because people think it indicates there has been a mistake," Reynolds says. "But we just don't want to miss the big ones."

Much as they might not have liked it, Austin and Reynolds were soon to become more than bit players in the second week of the NFL season. During the final nine minutes of the first half Sunday, they demonstrated why the replay system works. And why having it available gives both officials and teams a better chance to have the game's outcome decided fairly.

And that is the reason it exists - and the reason it should continue for seasons to come.

Replay shouldn't be considered a failure, even if an occasional call still isn't correctly adjusted. Until there are enough cameras in every stadium to give virtually unlimited viewing of every play, we'll have to settle for some inconclusive results.

Nor is replay a panacea to eliminate every officiating error, because too many types of calls remain excluded from replay territory. Still, this is a far better situation than not having replay available.

Of course, Ravens Coach Brian Billick might not agree. Three times in those nine minutes, plays were reviewed that, if reversed, would have benefited his team.

Buccaneers Coach Tony Dungy already has been fined $10,000 for criticizing the results of a replay decision - the league admits the officials were wrong when they overturned a call that went against Tampa Bay in its season opener - and Billick wanted to protect his bank account.

"I'll give you some quotes (criticizing replay) if you want to pitch in and help pay the fine," Billick says.

No one reached into their pockets, so Billick said nothing. He was wise, because all three replays were handled correctly by Austin, using television feeds provided by Reynolds and his three assistants.

For Billick and the Ravens, the decisions stung deeply, almost as much as allowing Stewart and the Steelers to drive for a winning field goal in the final seconds. But for Reynolds and Austin, there was relief that the system had functioned properly.

"I'm pretty much worn out," says Reynolds after the game. "It's like officiating again, except I am not running up and down the field. People think this is a piece of cake, but it's not."

Reynolds and his crew practice by reviewing every play in the contest. You should try looking at five or six versions of 120-plus plays every Sunday. Maybe working on the field is easier.

Austin didn't have his replay prayer answered, but no matter.

"We'd officiate, if they decided to put polka dots on the football," he says. "You won't see us saying, 'We don't like it.' We want to get the call right. We don't necessarily like ... to interrupt the game but that is what you have to do to apply instant replay."

And if ESPN shows a replay Sunday night that gives strong evidence one of these three calls should have been reversed?

"That's tough," he says bluntly. "We just have to live with what we see during the game."

And that is better than not having replay at all.

Bring it.

Defensive ends are a top priority on the list of the NFL's general managers

By Dan Pompei
The Sporting News

It's almost easier to win the lottery these days than it is to find a premier defensive end, so teams looking for pass-rush help are investing in other strategies and diversifying their portfolios.

"You can count the outstanding ones on one hand," says 49ers G.M. Bill Walsh, who had been trying to acquire Regan Upshaw in a trade with the Bucs until talks broke off last week.

These are the NFL defensive ends you can count on for more than 10 sacks per year over the next few years: Michael Strahan of the Giants, Michael McCrary of the Ravens, Michael Sinclair of the Seahawks, Robert Porcher of the Lions, Kevin Carter of the Rams and Andre Wadsworth of the Cardinals.

Six. That's it.

Just look around the league at some of the edge rushers who are critical to their teams' hopes. The Eagles are praying Mike Mamula, with a reconstructed knee, can become the type of player he never has been.

Losing Chad Bratzke forced the Giants to give former first-round pick Cedric Jones the opportunity he has failed to earn.

The Bucs gave their starting right end job to Steve White, who came into the season having been cut more times (twice) than he had started games (once).

The 49ers induced Charles Haley to end a two-year retirement, despite his bad back, bad attitude and bad birthday (January 6, 1964, which makes him 35).

To preserve Haley's health and perhaps the 49ers' collective sanity, Walsh told Haley to stay away from training camp, which is almost unheard of.

"The 49ers went after Haley like he's a dominant player," Vikings Coach Dennis Green says. "If that's the case, then it's not a dominant position anymore."

Even Walsh concedes, "We're going with a one-time great, hoping he still has something left. You'd like to think you could do better than that."

The problem is the 49ers didn't have many other attractive options, given their low draft pick and salary-cap restraints. And even if they had some cap space or were picking first in the draft, there wouldn't have been many intriguing alternatives.

Free agency generally doesn't offer much because premium pass rushers rarely are allowed to leave their teams. Strahan, Sinclair and McCrary recently signed contract extensions that will prevent them from becoming free agents.

When a decent pass rusher does find himself in the free-agent market, a team usually overpays, as the Colts did to get Bratzke this year.

Jevon Kearse was widely regarded as the best pass rusher in the '99 draft, and he slipped to the 16th spot in the first round, where the Titans selected him. Teams had reservations about Kearse's lack of production at Florida.

A lot of teams have wasted high picks on defensive ends in recent years. Bears director of personnel Mark Hatley says it's understood that if you want a defensive end, you must reach a little.

The Vikings alone have used three first-round picks on defensive ends in the last five years, and they have one starter to show for it, the emerging but still unproven Duane Clemons.

Many teams draft undersized ends, often referred to as 'tweeners, and hope they can fill out.

"You look at the 6-4, 235 guys and then try to get them to gain weight," says Walsh, who drafted a 'tweener this year in the third round in Purdue's Chike Okeafor. "You look for quickness, explosion and the ability to get leverage. Haley weighed 220 out of college, but he was tall, long and rangy. He added weight with conditioning and maturity."

But there have been many more misses than hits with undersized ends. See Mamula, Upshaw, John Thierry, Tony Brackens and Grant Wistrom.

One personnel director says he's so fed up with pass-rush busts that he'll never select a defensive end in the first round again.

You can try to de-emphasize the position, as the Jets have, or you can take the chipmunk approach, as the Dolphins have.

Instead of scrambling for ends, the Jets have stressed linebackers in their 3-4 defense.

While going with a motley collection of ends, Bill Parcells is spending close to $12 million on linebackers this year. Six Jets linebackers have average yearly salaries of more than $1 million.

Compare this with the Dolphins, who got 29 sacks from four defensive ends last year and added two more defensive ends this offseason in free agent Rich Owens and the waived Dimitrius Underwood.

Given the lack of high-quality defensive ends, the Dolphins are absurdly deep.

Some teams have tried to convert defensive tackles in an effort to get the best players on the field. The Packers had success moving Vonnie Holliday to end.

The Bears have tried it with three players - Shawn Lee last year, and Bryan Robinson and Russell Davis this year.

Player development might be the best hope. Some of the best pass rushers in the game weren't highly regarded coming out of college.

McCrary was a seventh-round pick in 1993. Sinclair was a sixth round pick in '91. But, the free-agent system does not always help players realize their potential.

"Athletes aren't with the same team anymore and don't hone their skills like they should with a single coach working with them and the same teammates to play beside," Walsh said.

For teams with inferior ends, scheming can help. It is possible to get pressure without much of a rush from the edge.

Men's tennis squad off to Rhody to compete in Northeast tourney

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

Call it a dress rehearsal for the upcoming season.

When the Massachusetts men's tennis team heads to Providence, RI this weekend for the inaugural Northeast Intercollegiate Tournament, it will be a prime opportunity for the squad to see how it matches up against the rest of the Northeast.

The tournament will feature Providence, Army, Connecticut, Boston University, Dartmouth, and Brown - teams that UMass coach Judy Dixon views as among the best in New England.

There are many question marks surrounding the fall edition of the Minutemen, but this weekend should begin to shed some light on the answers.

"We can be better this season," Dixon said. "Because we have the same schedule [as last year] but we have a better team."

However, whether or not the Minutemen can hold their own among the Northeast elite, largely depends upon the sophs and comebacks of several key players.

Dixon will be looking for strong performances from freshmen Will Shaw and Justin Simpson, who will both see action in singles and doubles play this weekend. Senior transfer Marco Caseva willlso be playing his first match for the Maroon and White.

Meanwhile, senior co-captain Parsa Santil, who went 3-6 last spring, before breaking his thumb, will play his first match for the team since his injury. Junior Fabien Rahmal will also be on the comeback trail, returning to the squad after breaking his pelvis in a van accident last year.

Durability is Dixon's main goal for the season. The aforementioned injuries plagued the team last year as it limped to a record of 11-12. While junior Bill Greener is currently sidelined with a sprained ankle, Dixon hopes that the rest of the team can remain healthy.

In addition to the loss of Greener, the Minutemen must forge through the season without senior co-captain Bo Navarro, who is ineligible due to academics.

This loss, coupled with the absence of Rob Manchester, who is also academically ineligible, places even more emphasis on the performances of the team newcomers this weekend.

"It's a blow to us for sure," said Dixon regarding the loss of Navarro and Manchester. "But, we have a very deep and talented squad."

With the lineup for the season tentative, the team is counting on sophomore standout Steve Prisco to be the beacon of consistency. Prisco, who went 8-12 at No. 1 singles last year, will look to improve upon his rookie record after performing superbly at pre-qualifying tournaments in Longwood and Newport, RI this summer.

Minutewomen to host Columbia

By Matt Seifert
Collegian Staff

Last weekend the Massachusetts women's tennis team was set to go down to beautiful West Point, New York for the Eastern Championships. The Minutewomen were heavily favored and were looking to romp over the competition.

But that plan, like EuroDisney, never took off. Hurricane Floyd moved in and caused UMass to withdraw from the tournament.

On Tuesday, the Maroon and White were slated to play against hometown rivals Amherst College, but rain moved in, causing further aggravation to a team that was set to kick off their season at home.

Now fast forward to the present. The squad has put its frustrations behind them and is looking forward to this Friday's match with Columbia at home, on the familiar Upper Boyden courts.

Although this is their first match of the season, UMass coach Judy Dixon sees it as one of paramount importance.

"This match (versus Colombia) should tell us how are season is going to go," she said.

True, Columbia was stomped on last year by UMass in a 7-2 romp, but this year is a whole new chapter. Columbia is already 3-0 and has made quick work of all their opponents.

They feature a different look with five freshmen on board, three of whom are starters. Freshman Andrea Sanders has already made an impact, going 3-0 playing first, second and third singles.

Despite the fact that bad weather is not expected to hamper this match, the Minutewomen will still have to deal with some adversity. Helenu Horak will be questionable for the match because of a forearm injury.

Dixon hopes that Horak will be able to play doubles but is doubtful as to whether she will be going at singles. This is where the squad finds themselves at a disadvantage.

"It will be difficult to win this match and it will be decided by sheer determination...everyone has to play to their ability," she said.

In the absence of Horak, Dixon is looking toward upperclassmen Ola Gerasimova, Robin Lebovitz, and Annie Hamilton to really take it to the next level.

"Ola won last year, and this time I am looking for Robin, Ola, and Annie to lead the team," Dixon said. "The match will be decided by our doubles play."

Teach-in takes center stage

Guest lecturers examine logistics of affirmative action in universities

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The second day of the University of Massachusetts' "Teach-In in Defense of Affirmative Action" was highlighted by a presentation regarding the court battle to defend race-based affirmative action at the University of Michigan.

Harvard University Professor of Education and Social Policy Gary Orfield and University of Michigan Professor of Higher Education Sylvia Hurtado spoke about the legal strategies used to support affirmative action, and the benefits of racial diversity in colleges and universities.

Hurtado had compiled data regarding affirmative action to defend the University of Michigan against the Center for Individual Rights, a conservative organization opposed to race preferences. At the crux of the lawsuit was the issue of whether colleges and universities have "a compelling interest" in preserving racial diversity, which would allow them to grant preference to minority students in admissions.

Hurtado's research showed that campus diversity was beneficial to students of all races.

"A lot of thinking we do is relatively mindless automatic thinking," she said. "Cognitive psychologists have found that encountering unfamiliar people and situations causes us to re-think things, and abandon [mindless] techniques."

According to Hurtado's research, students that attend racially diverse universities are more likely to have racially diverse friends, live in racially diverse neighborhoods and work in racially diverse environments.

"Students exposed to diversity in the classroom were more likely to be civically involved, and involved with leadership," she added.

Orfield spoke about affirmative action in a much broader tone, talking about the national movement state of affirmative action policies.

"There are propositions in our society that are very attractive to some people, and are obviously false," he said.

"One of these propositions is that the history of discrimination is over, and therefore we do not have any institutional obligation to offset the history of discrimination.

"Another is that our society is a 'meritocracy,' where everyone is given an equal chance. You can determine that is false by going into Roxbury and driving in any direction for an hour."

Orfield also mentioned the legal situation regarding the recent changes in admissions policies at UMass.

"The University announced that it was changing its policies in part because of the Boston Latin decision," he said, referring to a court verdict prohibiting the Boston Latin high school from using quotas.

"Unless there were quotas being used [at UMass], then Boston Latin was no reason for changing the policies. It was a real red herring to drag the Boston Latin case into this."

At the conclusion of the lecture, students and faculty were given a chance to ask questions of the speakers.

Chancellor David K. Scott used the opportunity to defend the University's admissions changes, saying that the University's previous admissions standards violated a U.S. Supreme Court case, not the Boston Latin decision.

"For the past five years we have been using procedures that, looked at now, went beyond the [Supreme Court] decision," he said.

One student questioned the fairness of affirmative action programs.

"I understand that you're saying that a diverse student population makes it easier to learn," said freshman psychology major Cheryl Morton, "but I don't understand how you can deny white students into a university because you let minorities in. Why are we forced to make the student population more diverse?"

"Any selective institution has a set of educational goals, and admissions policies are guided by a variety of these goals," responded Hurtado. "One of these goals is to shape to the student body, and [universities] try to create a model society on campus."

"There are costs," added Orfield. "There are people who are here who wouldn't be here. But we discovered in the 1960s that we can't achieve equality without race-conscious goals."

Forbes looks for minority support, votes

By Sam Fulwood
Los Angeles Times

MARION, S.C. — Steve Forbes brought his quixotic campaign for black voters to a large family farm here recently, addressing 200 of conservative talk show host Armstrong Williams' neighbors. Rain tap-tapped on the party tent. Gnats swarmed among the guests. Pork barbecue filled plastic plates.

But fewer than 20 blacks showed up- and half of them were members of Williams' extended family.

"We invited a lot of local black folks, and I thought we would have had more here," said Kent Williams, a loyal Republican and member of the local school board who cohosted the barbecue with his brother and other family members living on the farm. "It's really hard to get them away from the Democratic Party."

In his largely self-financed campaigns for the Republican presidential nomination, the 52-year-old Forbes often has marched to the beat of his own drummer. In 1996, he pounded a steady drumbeat for the flat tax, all but ignoring social issues. This year, he is seeking to broaden his reputation by courting black voters- recasting himself as a socially concerned politician in sync with the nation's growing racial diversity.

And unlike most political analysts who view his outreach effort as a calculated gambit to burnish his image with white and moderate Republicans, Forbes appears to believe that his message of economic opportunity will resonate with black voters newly enriched by a booming economy- and tired of being taken for granted by a complacent Democratic Party.

"Expanding economic opportunity for all Americans is the next great civil rights battleground for the 21st century," Forbes said. "My campaign is demonstrating that this message is not the typical (Republican) political message, but it's a people message."

Still, in the cold arithmetic of politics, the numbers don't seem to add up. About 90 percent of blacks register as Democrats. And black Republicans in the two early contest states, Iowa and New Hampshire, are as rare as 90-degree days in January.

For much of the early part of this century, black Americans identified closely with the Republican Party, thanks in large measure to President Abraham Lincoln's abolition of slavery.

Police action was warranted

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

In the past week, the University of Massachusetts Police have arrested two different individuals and discovered that, beyond what they were arrested for, the suspects were also wanted elsewhere.

Both Michael Skrabely, arrested last Tuesday, and Jerome Ezold, arrested last Saturday both had warrants active on them.

Skrabely, a 43 year-old resident of Hampton, New Hampshire, was arrested Tuesday morning and charged with driving an unregistered motor vehicle that was also uninsured, as well as driving that same vehicle on a sidewalk.

UMass Police had no comment on the Skrabely case.

Jerome Ezold, an 18 year-old resident of Holyoke, Massachusetts, arrested in Lot 32 for liquor law violations. After police checked out his records, they discovered that he was also wanted in Holyoke for similar violations.

Ezold was arrested for possession of alcohol by a minor and in doing a routine background check, officers discovered that he was wanted in Holyoke District Court on similar charges.

According to Barbara O'Connor, the University of Massachusetts Deputy Police Chief, a suspect can have a warrant out on him for various reasons.

"They could have been ordered to pay court fees and not done so, they could have been bailed out on a charge and then failed to appear, they could have been summoned to court and not appeared, and any of these things will eventually bring out a warrant on him," O'Connor said.

UMass Court Administrator Phil Cavanaugh agreed.

"If you're summoned to court, and you don't show up, the court can then issue a warrant. If you've been arraigned and don't show up for a pre-trial conference, the court can issue a warrant," Cavanaugh said. "If you're sentenced to community service and say 'aww, frig it' and don't do anything, a warrant can be issue for that."

Cavanaugh said that when someone is, for instance, pulled over, information about that person can be run through the Warrant Management System (WMS).

"We run a person's name, or license number, or registration through a computer and we can find out if that person has any outstanding warrants on them," Cavanaugh said. "Years ago, we had legacy warrants and they were warrants officers had in hand and had to keep track of. Needless to say that got to be a complete pain in the ass, so with this new WMS, we can know right away if we've got the person that fits the warrant."

If a person is found to have an outstanding warrant, they are taken into custody and the court where the warrant was issued is contacted.

"A court can instruct us to keep them in custody until the person can be picked up, or to let them go with an agreement that the person with the warrant will show up in court later, or they can be held until the next full day of court," Cavanaugh said, adding, "which means they're screwed if they're arrested on a Friday night."

According to Cavanaugh, it's up to the discretion of that court how they handle their warrants.

Scott addresses key campus issues

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

An overview of the most recent accomplishments and future desires at the University were expressed during the first Faculty Senate meeting of the year, held yesterday afternoon. The overall sentiment was that although there are issues to contend with, business on campus is progressing efficiently.

Chancellor Scott began the meeting by acknowledging the faculty for the Affirmative Action Teach-In, being held this week saying he felt it was a great achievement. To the dismay of Chancellor Scott this was not a universal feeling. The Graduate Student Senate expressed concern over affirmative action demanding that it should be re-instated. Scott responded, "The University has not stopped using affirmative action. It is still being used under what the Supreme Court of the United States allows." Although the forum of the meeting continued the conversation was left unresolved.

Among opening announcements, Javier Cevallos, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, outlined one of the most pressing issues on campus: housing. At the present time there are 170 students that are still living in temporary housing. "I toured the lounges where these students are living and they are very comfortable. At this point we are having a hard time convincing students to move," said Cevallos.

One concern that has been carried over from last semester for students is the University's stance on privatization. Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page said that the University is in the process of issuing bids for the bookstore. He wished to make it clear that although bids will be reviewed in the upcoming months, there has yet to be a final decision made on what the future of the bookstore will be.

Page also spoke on the progress of construction around campus. "The summer was very active," Page said. In that time, phase one of the Computer Science and Engineering Center was finished, with hopes that people will be moving in during this semester. The Animal Care Center is up and running, as well as the completion of the new lobby for the Fine Arts Center. Various roofs around campus were also re-constructed.

He indicated that there are continued areas of campus that will receive a face-lift as the year continues. Some of these areas include the new fence that is presently being put up and a new blacktopping job on the grounds between the Old Chapel and Goodell.

Moving in a new direction, Seth Avakian, Student Trustee, spoke on behalf of the Student Government Association. He expressed the SGA's wishes to work closely with the faculty for the common goal of improved learning. One issue that he brought to the table was feedback from students that advising during Freshman Orientation was not adequate.

The SGA also stated in a letter given to all faculty senate members, "We believe that a voluntary CATE guide, academic credit for varsity athletes, more stringent standards for Teaching Assistants, an admissions policy that creates a diverse community, and a Commonwealth College that enhances the entire campus are all important to the students on this campus."

During the meeting six new courses were approved as recommended by the Graduate Council. They include Community Health Studies 629, "Tobacco Control Policymaking in the United States," COM HI 630, "Politics of HIV/AIDS," Public Policy and Administration 601, "Politics and the Policy Process," PUBP&A 602, "Public Management," PUBP&A 604, "Policy and Program Evaluation," and PUBP&A 605 "Economics and Public Policy."

The meeting concluded with elections for two new At-Large members of the Rules Committee. Professor Mike Williams from the geosciences department and Professor Alexandra Deschamps from women's studies. Professor Joseph Larson was also elected Chair of the Rules Committee.

Women of Color convene

By Andrea M. Peers
Collegian Correspondent

Outstretched arms formed an arch walkway for participants in the Pilgrimage of the Middle Passage, to relive the walk back to the past of their ancestors, last night at the Seventh Annual Women of Color Reception.

The reception was held by the Women of Color Leadership Network to discuss the creation of a new sense of community. Some members of the network participated in the Pilgrimage of the Middle Passage, which traced the path of slavery back through the eastern United States, the Caribbean, Brazil, West Africa, and South Africa, by foot and by boat.

Jacqueline Pinn, the Interim Director of the network began the meeting with a brief welcome to those pilgrimage participants as well as the keynote speaker of the night, Sobonfu Some. Pinn described Some as a person who cannot only share her knowledge, but can share a piece of herself. Pinn extended the importance of Some's recent book, "Creating a New Sense of Community."

Some shared her heritage with the audience. Her name stresses her importance in the community. Translated, it means "the keeper of knowledge." She was born and raised in Burkina Faso in a nearby town called Dano. She is a healer who teaches womanhood and spirit to all and she is also a member of the Dagara tribe of West Africa. Both she and her husband travel and spread their message to all parts of the world.

Her main message to the audience was the inner meaning of strength and courage, which people must find in themselves and in the community.

"No matter where we are from, we need a spiritual centeredness, a new sense of community in our heart," Some said.

She said that everyone is born with a gift that they must in turn share with the community. Her definition of community differs from the geographical sense of community which most relate to. Some referred to community as a giving and receiving system, where each member must give their gift to others.

"Everyday you make up there are always possibilities you can share yourself with the world or mask yourself from it," Some said.

Another key speaker who introduced the pilgrimage was Ingrid Askew, the coordinating director for the Interfaith Pilgrimage of the Middle Passage. The purpose of the passage was to connect with their spirits as well as their ancestors. Each stop along the way marked a milestone in the journey. Participants visited old sites of slave auctions, slave quarters and the Underground Railroad.

In total, 16 members were honored in the pilgrimage. Among those honored were Askew, her daughter and Sister Clare Carter of the Nipponzan Myohoji Buddhist order. The heart felt ceremony honoring the walk continued with a song lead by Some to rejoice and praise the journey of these women. With hands extended outward, Some and the audience gave their appreciation to this strong group of women.

The ceremony was concluded with a poem read by four of the women, each in a different language: Japanese, Spanish, Ethiopian and Creole. The poem focused on the fears and weaknesses that people hold inside, and how these fears can be released, keeping people in touch, not only with themselves, but with the community.

"We all need to be a part of community because it reminds us about our gift to each other," Some said.

Jacqueline Pinn, Director of the Women of Color Leadership Network, introduces Sobonfu Some at the Network's annual reception last night.

LAPD's Rampart division cleans up, but at what cost?

By Mateo Gold and Mitchell Landsberg
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES — John Mills remembers a time when he was afraid to leave his Los Angeles area home, when gang gunfire reached as high as the windows of his 15th floor apartment.

Those days are over, Mills said, thanks to Los Angeles' Rampart Division police.

"Whatever means they used, they justified the ends," said the Westlake community leader, one of more than 250 people who jammed a luncheon Wednesday to honor the division at the heart of the largest Los Angeles police scandal in more than 50 years.

While the means used by some Rampart officers to quell gang and drug-related violence are now part of a broad probe into police brutality, residents strolling busy neighborhood streets past barber shops, music stores and food markets are voicing support for the division.

At the Rampart Boosters Association luncheon- planned long before the scandal broke- dozens of business owners and neighbors turned out to praise the Rampart Division for cleaning up a neighborhood they said had been terrorized by the notorious 18th Street gang.

Many residents said Wednesday they fear the ongoing corruption probe and suspension of two anti-gang injunctions will allow violent crime to once again flourish.

In this densely-populated area west of downtown, home to many recent Mexican and Central American immigrants, residents said they once felt under siege by gang members.

But in recent years, neighbors say, fewer shootings have punctured the air. Fewer drug dealers camp out in front of the aging apartment buildings teeming with families. Residents say that, for the first time, they feel safe going out at night.

"I used to be scared of getting shot when I went outside," said Margarita Marron, 40, as she shopped Wednesday with her young son. "But the last few years, I've felt much safer because the police are always around. I can walk freely at night."

Ever since two injunctions targeting members of the 18th Street gang went into effect during the last two years, Marron said, she sees less graffiti, drug dealing and public drinking around her home.

"But now I'm afraid, and the whole community is afraid, that it's going to go back to the way it was," she said.

The allegations that some Rampart Division officers beat and shot unarmed men is the talk of neighborhood, she said.

"We trust them, as police," Marron said. "We never thought they would do something like this. I've never been scared of them."

She turned to her 5-year-old son.

"Leonardo, how do you feel about the police? Are you scared of them?"

The little boy shook his head and smiled.

"No, 'me cuidan,'" he said. "They watch out for me."

Although most community members are appalled at the reports of alleged police corruption, "people see the police very much as (making) an effort to improve the area," said Father Jay Curnan, a priest at Pico Union's St. Thomas Apostle church.

For many neighbors, an aggressive police force is a small price to pay for safety. The neighborhood's battle against drug sales and gang shootings is exhausting and never-ending, they said.

A hair salon owner said the strip mall where she works used to be called "In 'N Out" because of frequent drug dealing in the parking lot.

In the early 1990s, the police spent a year constantly patrolling the street, sometimes with as many as eight patrol cars, said the owner, who did not want to be identified. Soon, the dealers fled.

"People don't see the good that Rampart does," she said. "Those of us with businesses suffered so much because of the crime and drugs."

Volatile silver screen star George C. Scott dead at 71, leaves legacy

By Stephen Hunter
The Washington Post

Nobody exploded better. When George C. Scott detonated, the rafters shivered, the screen shook, the dust and feathers flew, and strong men ducked for cover. No wonder he made such a wonderful general: He was a human bomb.

The actor, who died Thursday at 71 of natural causes, left a legacy of extraordinary performances, but it was the propulsion of his rage that drove the best of them. As Gen. George S. Patton in "Patton," he seemed to win World War II on a private stock of dark fury. As Gen. Buck Turgidson in "Dr. Strangelove," he lost World War III on the same fuel. "This commie rat was taking pictures of the War Room!" he bellowed in a spasm of aggression, wrestling with a fat Russian as the world ended all around him.

Scott's rage lurked behind smart dark eyes and a massive body that seemed to reek of strength. He had a haggard, beautifully bashed face that was muscular and grizzled at once, and wore its busted nose like a badge of honor. In most cases, you could feel his anger building slowly, ticking, the pressure mounting. He could hold the camera on sheer stillness alone as whatever infernal temperatures inside rose and rose.

Think of him as the coiled gambler Bert Gordon in his first great screen role in Robert Rossen's "The Hustler" in 1959. Bert is a cold student of human strength and weakness who knows the calculus of the soul extremely well. When at last his creation, Fast Eddie Felson (Paul Newman), finds the strength to leave him, there goes Bert: "You owe me money, Eddie!" he screams, and somehow the word "money" has never been filled with more horror.

As a philandering doctor in Richard Lester's stunning 1968 "Petulia," he listens to his ex-wife Shirley Knight's lament and it becomes clear that she represents everything that was compromised and banal in his life. This time the rage comes without buildup; it simply bursts from him as a force of nature- that is, a force of his nature- and then expresses itself in a plate of cookies he hurls at the wall, before he turns and stomps out, having said all he had to say.

And most memorably it came when Tim Considine's frightened GI begins to weep about the shells, the noise, the machine-gun fire in "Patton." As comprehension breaks over the general, his eyes widen with disgust and astonishment: "Why, you're nothing but a damn coward!" he explodes more forcefully than a German 88, his hand lashing out into a slap that almost ended a career.

The rage was evidently real. It certainly was in evidence in two of his most famous off-screen imbroglios, his refusal to accept the Academy Award for "Patton" in 1971- he called the Oscars a "meat parade" and watched a hockey game at his upstate New York farmhouse during the telecast- and his attempt to make a film in "The Savage Is Loose" (with his then-wife Trish Van Devere) that bypassed the rigid control and distribution system of the studios. As is perhaps a melancholy inevitability of a man of such titanic talents and angers, his own life was stormy, too. He seemed forever in search of peace and forever unable to find it- not the last angry man, but the eternally angry man.

He was born in Wise, Va., in 1926, and went into the Marine Corps for four years beginning in 1945. After a brief flirtation with journalism at the University of Missouri, he turned to the stage and spent the '50s working his way slowly up the ladder.

He arrived in New York in the immediate wake of Brando and "the method," where his intensity and intelligence and his lack of pretty-boy looks served him well. His first major triumph was as Shakespeare's angriest man, Richard III. That led to a string of movie supporting performances: he was as stunning in Otto Preminger's "Anatomy of a Murder" as he was in "The Hustler," though the latter won him his first Oscar nomination. After the breakthrough in 1963's "Strangelove" ("Mr. President, I smell a big fat commie rat!") he had an active if typical career as movie star, climaxing in 1970 with "Patton."

That was one of the great performances in movie history, from his riveting opening soliloquy to his blast of rage at the cowardly private to his muted disenchantment at war's end, when he knows his day is done.

But even as he was succeeding, he was becoming angrier. After denouncing the Academy in 1971 and the next year refusing to accept an Emmy for a television performance, he began the cruel slide from stardom. There were superb performances to come in "The Hospital" and "The New Centurions", but there were also terrible movies ahead, like the horror schlockers "The Changeling," "Beastmaster" and "Firestarter." After that last one in 1984 he left movies, at least until 1995's "Malice" (his last film), and concentrated on a distinguished but smaller scaled, and presumably less compromised and more satisfying, television and theater career.

Show me the money

Sam Wilkinson

It's the little things that really get under a person's skin and start to annoy. They just scratch this way and they itch that way and eventually, it just drives a person crazy.

Senate Republicans would be an example of that kind of irritant. What is irritating is how they routinely make a job of being failures.

Apparently, the Republicans that had taken up camp in the hallowed halls of Washington were suffering. They were making only $136,700 per year to sit in the Senate and make or not make, depending on your level of cynicism, various decisions. And they're elected for six year terms, so that's approximately $820,200 per term not including taxes, which, oddly enough, they are against for higher paid individuals, but anyway.

Can you imagine living on $136,700 per year?

One could only buy one new Chevy Suburban or Chrysler Town and Country per year on that salary and still expect to live comfortably.

One could only eat steak, and not T-Bone steaks, but Filet Mignons, every single night of the year and still expect to live comfortably.

This just isn't acceptable.

Our nation's Senators needed more money, and they needed a lot of it. It takes experienced men and women to make good decisions, and fortunately, our Senate is loaded with them. They recognized their own suffering and did what any like-minded person would do.

They gave themselves a raise.

To aid the suffering of Senators everywhere, the Senate voted to give themselves an additional $4,600 per year, or, if one wants to look at the bigger picture, $27,600 per term.

Whew.

And with that pending national disaster out of the way, Senators were then able to move on towards other projects: proposing bloated ways to spend the budget surplus for example, or trying to figure out how to convince voters that that they needed that extra $4,600 a year.

Only, in trying to get close enough with the voters to convince them that they really needed their raises, Senate Republicans did as Senate Republicans do – they made a bonehead error.

They killed a proposed hike in the minimum wage.

Is that not the biggest hypocritical action they could have taken?

"We need more monies because we already have a lot, and you people, who are working hard for peanuts, do not," seems to be the party policy here.

Now what is the deal?

We've got a country that is on an economic rampage. The stock market is breaking records never before thought possible, and it's doing so daily. CEOs and other management types are making more and more money. People are acquiring material positions by the boatload and the boat. The country itself is coming up with a huge budget surplus.

But as far as the Republicans are concerned, screw the people working everyday for minimum wage.

There are 11 million people working for minimum wage in America today, and according to calculations, that means a person who works five days a week for eight hours a day for every month of the entire year is going to end up making $10, 712. In other words, in six years, that is a person who will make less than half of what a Senator was making in one.

And that $10,712 has got to buy things.

It has to buy food.

It has to buy clothing.

It has to buy shelter.

It has to buy heat.

It has to buy health.

And at the same time, it can't be used to pay for any of the extra-curricular things that many people (and the Senate Republicans would be an example of this) take for granted.

People on minimum wage can forget about a lot of things.

Forget new clothes.

Forget cable television.

Forget expensive foods.

The proposed pay raise was fifty cents an hour. Fifty cents. Half of a dollar. Is that really going to put a hurting on businesses like McDonalds, or Burger King, or 7-11 or any of the other businesses that pay minimum wage?

That extra fifty cents would have provided an extra $1,040 dollars in a person's life, per year. How can the Republicans possibly justify a pay increase for themselves when they are already making money that is wildly more than the average American, and then turn around and be against a pay increase for someone who needs the money?

This is yet another clear example of how Republicans, or at least those that occupy the seats in the Senate, couldn't care less about those who are working hard every day to live out their version of the American dream. When a political leader is against something so simple and relatively cheap as a minimum wage hike that would help millions and millions of people, and at the same time is busy enough to look out for his or her own interests, that person is a failure.

And if those individuals are failures, the Senate Republicans who are against a minimum wage hike are irritating failures, plural.

Letters to the editor

Tell me about life in Amherst

To the editor:

For a book on the American college town, I would appreciate hearing from anyone with insights or information relevant to the evolution and contemporary character of Amherst as a college town. I would welcome personal observations and reminiscences, correspondence, diary entrees, photographs, clippings, student research papers and citations to published sources on the subject.

I am especially interested in the following topics: the evolution of the campus and its use for non-academic activities, the impact of the growth of the school on the city, town-gown relations, student-oriented commercial areas, off-campus student residential areas (e.g., "fraternity row" and the "student ghetto"), traditional faculty neighborhoods, college-related industrial development, the legacy of the 1960s, the college town as a place of personal discovery, the impact of college sports on local life, college town eccentrics, the seasonality of life in college towns and images of college towns in literature and film.

I am also interested in a broader sense in what life is like in college towns and how college towns differ from other cities. Please respond to Blake Gumprecht, Department of Geography, University of Oklahoma, 684 Sarkeys Energy Center, Norman, OK 73019-1007 or gumprecht@ou.edu.

Thank you for your consideration.

Lessons in life

Dan Viens

I can't really remember that much about eighth grade. I remember kids used to get in fights behind the Chinese restaurant across the street. I remember wearing dumb clothes. I recall being at an awkward stage when I didn't know if I should shave every now and then or just live with that silly monkey mustache that a lot of misguided kids have. Let's face it: there are millions of awkward things facing eighth grade boys and girls. I mean being thirteen can be very stressful and confusing. When you are at that age you're kind of at the crossroads of your youth. You're just barely too old for a bunch of stuff that you've been doing for a while, and you're too young to do all of the stuff you're looking forward to.

This awkward phase is the reason that I was so appalled when I took a look through my younger cousin's eighth grade Home Ec / Health book. Some of the chapters in the book are outdated by 40 years and other chapters are just plain bunk. As a result of the publisher irresponsibly printing such a pile of horse manure, I will share with you some excerpts and expose Markloff Publishing for the group of hacks that they are.

I will start with chapter one of the Health section of the book. The chapter is entitled "Lovemaking." The book states, "Sexual intercourse is a beautiful act that is only to be shared by a married couple. The act should occur only when procreation is the ultimate goal. In all instances of sexual intercourse the lights should be off, the man should be on top, a sock should be in the mouth of the female and her mother must be sitting at the foot of the bed ready to administer a cleansing bath to her daughter."

This is absolutely ridiculous. Fine... I can deal with the part that ideally everyone should wait until they are married to have sex, but that whole ritual with the mother is preposterous. I could never be intimate with a woman just thinking about her mother never mind if she was at the foot of the bed humming or knitting or something.

The next section that blew my mind was chapter seven of the health section. This chapter was all about the digestive system. Part one was devoted to the continual running of the digestive system and part two was devoted to the cleansing of it. The gist of part one was that everyone should drink about four ounces of 10W-30 motor oil daily to " keep one's digestive track properly lubed in order to prevent the back up of food." The main scope of part two was that at the end of each day, a small chunk of bar soap should be melted in the oven for each member of your family and then poured down each of their throats. The book states that " slowly throughout the night, the hot liquid soap will make its way from your loved one's mouth to their rectum, cleansing their entire digestive system."

All I can really say about this is that there is no way in hell I am feeding my kids 10W-30 oil. If I'm going to lube up their insides then you better believe I'm going to spring the extra couple bucks for 10W-40.
